III. I close with a third point, upon which I will be very brief: there is

A PERIOD SET.

How long are we to seek the Lord? "It is time to seek the Lord, till He rain righteousness upon you."

I believe that very much seeking of the Lord is based on ignorance, that there are some who really set about seeking the Lord as if they could not find Him, and as if He were a long way off. This is corrected by the apostle in those memorable words, "Say not in thy heart, Who shall ascend into heaven, or who shall descend into the depths? The word is nigh thee." How nigh thee? "In thy mouth." That is how nigh it is. "In thy mouth." What hinders a man's receiving that which is in his mouth? Swallow it, man. Swallow! That is all thou hast to do. It is in thy mouth: nothing can be nearer, surely, than to have it in thy mouth.

Oh! if I were dying, and I had a live-long lozenge in my mouth, and I knew that it would save my life, do you think I would not suck it down? Ah! would I rest until it was down? I should not care if a critic stood by and said, "You must not eat that lozenge. You are not worthy of it." I have got it in my mouth, and your remonstrance comes too late; it is gliding down my throat. "Oh! but you must not swallow that lozenge: you are not fit to receive it." I have got it, and I defy any one to rob me of it, for down it goes. "But you must not, really, partake of it; it may not be meant for you. Perhaps you are not in the election of grace." In vain your supposition. I have got it in my mouth, and if possession is nine points of the law it is all the points of the Gospel. I take it into my inward parts, and I will never part with it. That is just the Gospel.

But, about this seeking. You see that there are some that forget that it is so very near them, and they go seeking; but, if thou seek the Lord, soul, whatever of ignorance mingles with the search, I exhort thee to persevere in seeking the Lord, till He rain righteousness upon thee. Seek you the Lord, my dear hearer, till you find Him; never be satisfied with means; rest not till you get the end, find the Lord, or else go on seeking.

"Well," sayest thou, "but I may, perhaps, wait long; I have waited long already, and I am weary." Suppose it to be so, is it not worth waiting for? But I tell thee, thy waiting is very much through thine own ignorance. As I have already said, the word is nigh thee, and thou mayest have it to-night; even now thou mayest have it, for it is in thy mouth. If those poor blind eyes are delivered from the scales that hide a present Saviour, e'en now, at this moment, thou mayest give that look of which we sing:

"There is life for a look at the Crucified One;
  There is life at this moment for thee;
Then look, sinner—look unto him, and be saved—
  Unto him who was nail'd to the tree."

Yet, if thou dost not understand it, cease not to seek that light may come. Pardon will pay thee abundantly when it comes. Thou sayest, "I have been pleading for months." Then do not waste all that thou hast done, I pray thee. Come and close with Christ, and get now the answer to all those prayers.

Think of Columbus, within three days of America, that wondrous land in which he believed. He saw few signs of it—here and there a bit of seaweed—some little tokens that there might be land ahead; and the mariners declared that they would sail no farther upon that mysterious sea. Suppose that, within three days of the shore, Columbus had turned back; then had he lost all his pains for lack of a few hours' perseverance. And thou, to-night, perhaps, within half an hour of joy unspeakable—thou, within the next ten minutes able to rejoice in Christ and find present salvation—wilt thou now start back? No, by the Eternal Godhead, push thou on! Oh! Spirit of the living God, push the sinner on, and lead him now to say, "If I perish, I will perish pleading for mercy, and hoping in the grace of God by Jesus Christ."

"It is time to seek the Lord, till He rain righteousness upon you." That is how long you have to seek Him. I will give you and with that conclude. You know the story of Elijah when the heavens had long been deaf, a brazen concave that mocked the desires of men. He went up to the top of Carmel, and he began to pray. With groans and cries and tears, with his head between his knees, he used language which God only heard, but it was mighty pleading. Then he said to his servant, "Go up now, look toward the sea; and Gehazi went up, and looked toward the sea: he gazed down there along the sea-line, and up there above the Lebanon; and then he cast a wistful look around, and came back, and said, "There is nothing."

The prophet, while his servant had gone, had been crying more importunately. He had been pouring out his soul to its very depths before God, saying, "I will not let thee go except thou bless this thirsty land." A second time he said to Gehazi, "Go again!" I think I see Gehazi going and looking; but he perceives nothing. "Master," he said, "there is nothing." But the prophet had been praying still, and so he said, "Go," a third time; and away went Gehazi, thinking it was a fool's errand. He went and looked, and said, "There is nothing."

But what says Elijah to him? "This last time while thou hast been gone I have prevailed. I have believed that I have the petition which I asked, and I know I have it. Go, Gehazi, go and look. I said to thee, go again seven times; so go and look again." When he reaches Carmel's top, and casts his eye over the sky, there is a little cloud. He comes back and he declares, "Behold, there ariseth a little cloud out of the sea, like a man's hand."

Up rises the prophet, and wraps his mantle about him. The rain is coming, and he sends Gehazi in haste down to Ahab, to warn him against the nearing deluge, saying, "Prepare thy chariot and get thee down, that the rain stop thee not." Nobody could hear it, but Elijah had marvellous ears as he had a marvellous voice with God. He runs before Ahab's chariot in sacred exhilaration of delight. The heavens are already beginning to turn to blackness, and the first big drops are falling. Elijah has prevailed.

Now, get you to your chambers to-night—you that have not found the Lord; and come not forth till you have found Him, and He has given you grace as a mighty shower. If, by the morning light, there be but a little hope, and though you can only say, "God, be merciful to me a sinner," keep the watches and continue the prayer. Oh soul, though thou canst only cry, "Lord, I believe; help thou mine unbelief," yet watch on, and seek on, for the Lord will rain righteousness upon you. A deluge of mercy shall descend, and your heart shall rejoice, for this is His own promise, "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I the Lord will hear them, I the God of Israel will not forsake them." So be it unto you. Amen.

TALES OF THE GROG-SHOPS.

By a London Clergyman.

THE TWO WATCHERS.

THE SECOND WATCHER.

"YOU cannot see her. She must be kept quiet. She's as ill as she can be, and live."

So saying, the doctor left the house. It was Jamie's house, and it was to Jamie these words were spoken. And they smote home upon his soul like a thunderbolt. He trembled and quivered in every joint ; and his heart gave such great thumps that he could not restrain it. There he sat almost stunned at the news. "My Susie at the point of death !" he sobbed ; "and my fault too. I did it all. Oh, the drink ! the drink ! a hundred thousand curses on it."

And then he looked upon the hand that struck her, and brought it down upon the edge of the chair on which he sat, as though he would gladly have broken every joint in it.

"I'd give this hand to recall that blow," he muttered. "I'd give my life to recall that fatal night."

"What can I do for her ? What can I do for her ?" he cried again, rising up, and walking up and down the kitchen.

And then he looked about on the furniture, and saw how much had disappeared through his drunken habits.

What a wretched home for her, whose home in the country was so bright ! How different from that with which they had begun life ! And he had done it all, all, all. And heavy and deep were the groans which these accusing thoughts forced from his burdened soul.

"And should she die," he continued, "I should be her murderer. Oh ! this is more than I can bear."

Snatching up his hat, he went out. But he could not stay out. He must return to his home again. He must watch there. He must be within sound of the sick one's voice, and be near should the worst come to pass. He must ask his Susie's forgiveness before she died.

How slowly the moments moved ! How many were the alarms he received ! Every quick step across the floor above seemed to him to speak of death. And every groan and moan of pain bore to his fears the same mournful message. How often did he take off his heavy fisherman's boots, and creep up the stairs, and listen outside the door, if so be some stray word of hope or despair might reach him ! He would have liked to stay there altogether, but sharp voices forbade it, and bade him keep out of the way, because "he had done mischief enough already." But Susie never said so. And so he crept softly up and down, and never stayed there long.

How jealous he felt at first when the clergyman was admitted into her room and he forbidden. But this was only for a time ; for his was the only kind voice he heard. And Jamie felt so utterly wretched that his comforting sayings wonderfully soothed him. Besides, the clergyman told him of some one else, who spoke more kindly even than he could, and who did as many kind things as he said, and who loved him, Jamie, although he had been so bad and cruel.

And when Jamie asked him who it was, who could love such a wretch as he, and heard that it was God's own dear Son, it came like a bright light into the darkness of his soul, and made him calmer than he had been ever since Susie's illness. But not at first. It was too wonderful to be believed at first. But little by little it stole upon him, until it rose before his heart as a real fact ; and then it never left him by night or by day. He was ever running his thoughts over the past, and recalling the scenes in which his wickedness had been greatest, and with these before him he would ask, "And Jesus loved me, then ?"

Oh ! the shame that filled him as he thought of the uplifted hand, and the staggering form of his Susie as she fell before the blow, and then remembered that Jesus had loved him even then. It quite broke him down. He could not keep the tears back, try as he might.

He had always some question to ask the clergyman when he called. And so it happened that Jamie, the rough, swearing, drunken fisherman, actually began to look out for the coming of one whom he had ever made a mock at before.

Oh ! it was good to see these two in that little bare kitchen—the one pouring out, and the other drinking in the wonderful truths of God's great love.

"Wonderful ! wonderful !" Jamie would say to himself ; "only to think that Jesus died for me ! for my sins ! It seems a'most too good to be true. And yet the Book says it. Yes, it's true, all true. And He meant me too ; and I'm only to believe it. Wonderful ! wonderful !"

And when Jamie learned to pray, how often he used to kneel down, and pray for Susie, that she might not die, and for himself, that he might be evermore kept from the drink, and from all sin. In truth Jamie had become altogether another man. And when Jamie's fellow-fishermen came in to see him, and to ask how Susie was, they soon detected it.

To see him so quiet who was once so boisterous ; to hear him speak of a Saviour ; and to find him, as they almost always did now, with his Bible open before him, was wondrously strange. Many of them were inclined to think that his mind was turned by remorse and trouble, and tried hard to draw him back again to the public house "to divert his mind a bit." But they only tried this once, for at the first proposal he jumped to his feet with set lips and flashing eyes, which there was no mistaking the meaning of.

No need for him to burst out in an almost furious tone, "My curse, my heaviest curse, be on the drink ! Never, never will I touch it more." And when he turned to them, and laid his hands upon their shoulders, and looking them straight in the face, warned them against it as a serpent which would sting them one day as it had him unless they gave it up, they felt no inclination to laugh ; a grave expression mounted to every face and stayed there.

And much was it deepened when Jamie confessed his own sin, and spoke of the Saviour in whom he was trusting, and the change which had come over him since he began to trust ; and pleaded with them, his eyes full of tears, to seek the same dear Saviour who had done so much for him.

And when he spoke of their poor wives, and what a heavy burden drink laid upon their shoulders, the thought of Susie suffering above touched his lips with an inspiring fire which filled his words with life, and struck upon the ears and hearts of his fellow-fishermen with a stinging force, which wounded some of them for days.

There was no doubt about his being a changed man. And as day after day passed on, and he still watched and waited, his ear ever on the listen, and his soul ever mounting upward for Susie, and for himself, there came at last a summons from Susie. "I want to see Jamie," had been her daily cry ever since she had been ill.

And Jamie came. Of course he did. And he wanted to say so much that he could scarcely say anything at all. And so they looked at each other, and said what they had to say with their eyes, and said it well too. And Susie would take hold of the great brown hand, which she was hiding away, and give it a forgiving kiss. And who can wonder at the great fisherman breaking quite down, and hiding his face in the bed-clothes, and sobbing ? After a time, however, they found their tongues. Jamie told Susie that he had given up the drink altogether, and had signed the pledge, and meant to stick to it too—and how he had been praying for strength to keep it.

And at this word "praying" Susie started, and looked glad, and then told him a great secret, that she too had begun to pray, and that God had smiled upon her, too, with His great forgiveness. Whereat Jamie suggested that as they had both learned to pray, they should have a little prayer there and then.

Oh ! it was a happy pair. And as the light flickered in the gloom, and shot up down on the opposite wall, and the wi howled without, and the rain pattered, patte against the window panes, who can wonder it should recall thoughts of the past in their minds, and give such a point and edge to t bliss as is beyond description ?

Jamie had had strict orders not to stay long ; and Susie too had been warned to dis him soon. But these injunctions had escaped their memories. Hours pass as min when the heart is glad and there is much to And who can wonder that these two quite their reckoning, and knew not how the sped ? They had never had such a glad mee before—no, not even in the days of their c ship.

But the excitements this side the sea have been fully equalled on the other this week. Two hundred thousand people came out to greet to Milan. The old champion of Italian liberty is done with wounds and long marches, and is taking a banquet of huzzas. There is something sublimely touching in the gratitude of the Italians toward this magnetic warrior. Take the names of Garibaldi and Victor Emmanuel and Cavour from the history of that nation, and you take away the brightest and most thrilling pages. Garibaldi had but to rise in his stirrups and give one shout, and the Italians would follow him to victory or to death. Now, sick and old, he rides out to the celebration of the battle of Mentona, and, overcome by the excitement, he goes in to lie down, unable to endure the cheers.

What a grand thing that he has lived to see Italy free ! Part of the price of its emancipation he paid with his own blood. He was born to lead, and in all the sky of Italian history there is no constellation brighter than the name and the patriotism and the genius of Garibaldi. All honor to the men who live, and plan, and fight, and suffer, and die for their country. If I ever see Italy, there are two sights I want especially to see—St. Peter's and Garibaldi.

It has been a week of still greater

EXCITEMENT IN IRELAND.

Mr. Parnell, Mr. Dillon, and others not so well known in America have been indicted for their political movements. Alas for Ireland ! If she have not famine, she has war and insurrection. When will the long dispute of five hundred years be settled ?

It is beyond the Disraelis and the Gladstones of earthly cabinets—this question of landlord and tenant. The God who settled our slavery question is the only Being who will give rest to distracted Ireland. But though her disquietude seem farther off from adjustment than ever, that land, so rich in scenery and undeveloped resources, will yet be brought out of her distresses. It is easy for us to stand three thousand miles away and say how we would do if we were in Parliament, or in the English cabinet, or on the throne. We do not know what we would do. The trouble is so portentous and appalling that there is only one thing we can do, and that is to commend the whole subject to the God of nations, imploring im to cut short Hin righteousness the troubles of Ireland.

The philanthropists of Great Britain are at their wits' end to-day, and know not what is best to do. It is certain things cannot remain as they are—the commerce of a whole nation paralyzed ; torch and knife ready for devastation ; excited populations surging up and down. Occasional revolution may do good, but no nation can live on revolution. The next few years will find the English rule of Ireland more strict and rigorous than ever before, or Ireland an independent nation. May God decide all for the best happiness of all the people !

Among the most profitable events of the week is of to-day and to-night. Indeed, this is the third stormy Friday night ; as if on this night, in all parts of the land set apart for devotions, God would call upon the people to give thanks that the long drought is ceasing. Not for forty years have the streams run so low, and on all sides there has been the cry of water famine. Thank God for the rain, baptizing the mountains and the plains, starting the water-wheel of the factories, and pouring down through viaducts and aqueducts to cool the throat of the cities.

With what stupid ingratitude we take these common blessings of life. We thank God for the luxuries, but how little appreciation we have of those things that are more important—the necessities ! Though the rain of to-day be worth five millions of dollars to the people, our chief anxiety is lest we get our feet wet. For the sunlight, for the fresh air, for the rain, forget not to praise God ; and while the fields get the refreshment, why not the churches ?—rain of pardon, rain of comfort, rain of revivals. Yea, we need a freshet to sweep everything before it.

Oh for the descending floods of salvation ! We want high tide of peace. We want the whole land submerged with benediction. Rain on, ye natural heavens ! Rain on, ye clouds of hovering mercy ! From this time forth we plunge deeper into the work of God. The long nights are here, and for Christ and the Church we must be busy. Gather up all your resources. Our time on earth is being abbreviated. This may be our last season for active work. Let us ply all our energies—body, mind, and soul enlisted for God. Who knows how much we may do this season ?

You know that Ignatius was put to death for his religion. Trajan ordered his body opened, and it was said that when the heart of Ignatius was exposed in the post-mortem examination, it was found that the name of Jesus Christ was written all over it in letters of gold. Would that upon our souls in life and death there might be the same inscription ! To Him we this night surrender. His sacrifice our hope ; His work our joy; His eternal companionship our ambition. Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever !

OUR FRONTISPIECE ILLUSTRATIONS.

OUR frontispiece presents a picture of sledges drawn by Esquimaux dogs just starting from a snow-locked vessel in the Arctic regions with some of the crew on their land explorations.

And above, at the side of Sir John Franklin's portrait, is a picture of the burning of Guy Faux, on November 5th, by the crew of one of the ice-bound vessels of the exploring expeditions. In September the vessels usually became locked immovably, in which the ice sometimes did not melt until July in the following year. In October the sun totally disappeared, twilight darkened into night, and the true darkness, silence, and solitude of the Polar winter set in. It was, of course, necessary to find amusement, as well as occupation, for the crew, and this, under the circumstances, was a very difficult matter. Alter the daily routine, including ship's duties, devotions, study, meals, etc., occasions for festivity sometimes presented themselves.

November 5th, was observed in the customary manner ; and, as shown in our picture, a huge bonfire was constructed on the ice, and a variety of pyrotechnic feats performed. Several of the officers' birthdays, which opportunely fell within the winter months, were also kept with becoming cheerfulness.

THE PIETY OF SIR JOHN FRANKLIN.

CAPTAIN SHERARD OSBORN, in the journal of his Arctic explorations, says : "Franklin and his matchless followers need no eulogy from me ; the sufferings they must have undergone, the mystery that hangs over them, are on every tongue in every civilized land. Who among us does not feel his heart throb faster in recalling to recollection the calm heroism of the veteran leader who, when about to enter the unknown regions, of which Wellington Channel is the portal, addressed his crews from the solemn and emphatic words of Holy Writ : "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve," and found in that blissful choice his strength and his endurance ?

One of the men who sailed with Sir J. Franklin wrote of him :

"The more I see of our worthy chief the more I like and admire him ; in fact, he is deservedly loved by us all, seamen as well as officers. As this day (Sunday) will serve as a sample of what has already taken place on the Lord's Day, I will describe our observance of it. We assemble at prayers at ten o'clock ; the beautiful service of the Church of England is read by Sir John in the most impressive manner, after which a sermon adapted to our pursuits is also most impressively delivered. At seven in the evening all those who are desirous assemble in Sir John's cabin, when the Evening Service is read, and another sermon delivered.

A Remedy for Low Spirits.

"CLAUDE coming to-morrow !" I repeated over and over to myself. All the old troubles seemed to have come back again. I had hoped that I should never see him again, that our paths in life would never cross each other. And now Claude was coming to-morrow. How astonished he would be to see me here ! I wondered how we should meet, and whether he would feel it as much as I did.

As I sat alone in my room I prayed for grace and help, and I felt that the strength came as I prayed. Still I felt that I could not go downstairs, until Evelyn's maid came to tell me that Miss Trafford wanted me.

"You naughty girl !" said Evelyn when I entered, "what have you been doing ? Why, you are as cold as ice ; come to the fire and warm your hands. I really could not let you stop up there any longer. Do you know I thought you were, at last, turning into the brown alpaca ! She always shut herself up in her bedroom half the day."

"And who in the world is the brown alpaca ?" said Alice Fitzgerald ; "do tell me about her, Evelyn."

Evelyn was only too pleased to do so. And then we went on from one laughable subject to another, and Alice Fitzgerald told us a number of amusing stories, in such an absurd way that we laughed until we were quite tired.

"There," she said, at last as Evelyn declared that she had not laughed so much the whole time she had been ill, and that she felt all the better for it, "that's just what I was saying before Miss Lindsay came into the room ; if only people, when they are in low spirits, would laugh more, they would be all the happier."

"But when you are in trouble you can't laugh, Miss Fitzgerald," I said.

"Oh, then, you should try," she said ; "try to forget the trouble, and laugh it off. That's always my way when anything bothers me or vexes me. I try to think of something amusing, and forget it."

"And do you always succeed ?" I ventured to ask.

"Well, no, not quite always," she said, rather gravely.

It was the first time that I had seen her look grave ; her merry, laughing face was clouded for a moment.

But it was only for a moment.

"Anyhow," she said, "if you don't quite succeed in forgetting your trouble, it does not make it so hard to bear ; it is better to go laughing through a trouble than crying through it. But laugh it off if you can, that's much the best way."

"But, suppose you can't laugh it off ?" I said. "You owned that there were some troubles which were too deep to be got rid of in this way ; suppose you can't laugh it off, and the trouble comes back after every laugh as heavy as ever—what then ?"

"Oh, then," she said, with a shrug of her shoulders, "we must bear it, I suppose—bear it as best we can. Don't you think so ?"

"I never try to laugh trouble away," I said ; "I try to pray it away."

"Oh," she said scornfully, "you believe in prayer, do you ?"

"Yes, don't you, Miss Fitzgerald ?"

"No, not now," she said ; "I did once. That is to say, I never prayed much myself, but I used to believe that it did some people good ; but Claude says that is all nonsense. My brother Arthur and he are always having long discussions about these things. Arthur believes in the Bible with all his heart and soul, and Claude does nothing but laugh at him."

"And you agree with Claude, of course," said Evelyn, laughing.

"Yes," said Alice, "I agree with him ; and yet, do you know, I sometimes wish I didn't."

"May I ask, why not ?" I said.

"Well," she said, "you mustn't tell Claude, he would be so angry ; but I can't help thinking if Arthur should be right after all—what then ?"

"Yes, what then ?" I said ; "if the Bible is true—what then ?"

"Why, then," she said, laughing again, "we are all lost, I suppose ; so the best we can do is to enjoy ourselves as much now as we can. A short life and a merry one, that's my motto ! Well, I suppose it is getting near dinner time," she said, as she hastily rose, gathering up her work, and left the room.

"She is a queer girl," said Evelyn, as soon as the door was shut.

"She is not really happy, Evelyn," I said. "She tries to laugh it off, as she says ; but there is a great deal of miserable uncertainty in her heart, I feel sure of that."

"Well," said Evelyn, turning the subject, "won't you dress for dinner ? Ambrose will be here in a moment."

So I left the room and went up-stairs, and prayed very, very earnestly for them both, and especially for Alice Fitzgerald. Oh, if she only knew where true joy was to be found !

The next day Claude arrived. I was in Evelyn's sitting-room when Alice Fitzgerald brought him in to introduce him to her. And then she turned to me.

"An old friend of yours, Claude, I believe," she said.

Claude started ; he had not noticed me before.

"May—Miss Lindsay," he said, coloring painfully, "I did not expect to see you here."

And then he turned the subject quickly, and began to give us an account of his journey, his Oxford adventures, and all sorts of other things, till dinner was announced. I could see that he was not at his ease, and I was almost afraid that Alice Fitzgerald noticed it also.

I saw very little more of Claude that evening, for I always dined up-stairs with Evelyn, and he spent the evening in talking politics with Sir William over the library fire.

But the next morning when I came downstairs, Claude was alone in the breakfast-room. I shook hands with him, and said "Good-morning ;" and then was about to leave the room again, when he called me back, and said hurriedly,

"May, what did you tell them ?"

"Tell whom ?" I asked.

"Tell her," he said, in a hoarse whisper. "What did you tell her about me ?"

"Only that we played together when we were children, and lived next door to each other."

"Was that all ?" he said.

"Yes, every word," I answered. "You surely did not think, Claude—"

"Oh no," he said, "of course not, only it's more comfortable to know. All right, May," he added, carelessly, "we will let bygones be bygones now."

And then he sat down to the piano and played a merry air.

I stood and looked out of the window, and wondered at the shallowness of his heart. And I felt, as I had never felt before, that I had not made a bad choice when I chose Christ's love and gave up Claude's.

In a few minutes the others came down, and we had breakfast ; and while we were at breakfast Ambrose came in with the letter-bag, which he solemnly laid before Sir William, as was his daily custom. Sir William took a key from his watch-chain and unlocked the bag, and then proceeded to distribute the letters.

"None for you this morning, Miss Alice," he said, laughing. "Which would you choose : to have your young man here to talk to you, or to get a letter from him ? None for you, Miss Lindsay, not a single one ; six for me, and one for Mr. Ellis—that's all !"

Claude took his letter, opened it, and glanced hastily through it. The contents did not seem to be of the most agreeable nature, for he looked very annoyed as he read it, and then crushed it up impatiently and thrust it into his pocket. Alice glanced inquiringly at him, but Claude appeared to be engrossed in the carving of chicken, and took no notice of her inquirin looks.

When breakfast was over, Sir William wen into the library, where he generally spent th morning looking over the newspapers and writin his letters. We went up to Evelyn's room. thought Alice wanted to linger behind, that sh might speak to Claude ; but he did not seem di posed to take the hint, and followed me closel up-stairs.

We found Evelyn lying on the sofa, and wai ing for me to show her how to do a new patter in crochet work, which I had learned fro Aunt Jane, who was very clever with her fi gers. I sat down on a low stool close to Evely directing her as she worked ; and Alice a Claude went to the other end of the room, in the large bow-window.

Claude had brought a newspaper up-stairs wi him, and, throwing himself into an arm-chair, began to read it, with an air which plainly in mated that he did not wish to be disturbed.

Alice Fitzgerald came behind him, and leani over his shoulder, with her arm on the back the chair, she seemed to be reading the new paper with him. But after a minute or two heard her say,

"Let me see that letter, Claude ; what was about ?"

"Oh, it was nothing particular," said Claud turning to another part of the newspaper ; " was only a business letter."

"That's always the way with men," sa Evelyn, laughing ; "whenever they don't wa you to see a letter they always say 'It's only business letter.' Papa always does so, and i of no use my telling him that I like busine letters ; he only laughs and says, 'Women do understand business, or, if they do, they oug not.'"

But Alice Fitzgerald did not let the matt drop. In a few minutes I heard her ask ag from whom the letter had come, and Claude swered, in a vexed tone,

"It is only from my father, Alice. The take it and read it if you make such a fuss ab it !" and he tossed the letter out of his pocke

Alice sat down and read it, and, when she h gone through it once, she turned it over and re it again, and then, folding it up very gravely a slowly, she handed it back to Claude. He it into his pocket, and went on reading. Al leaned over his shoulder, and her face, wh was generally so bright and merry, was v grave and thoughtful. Evelyn and I were b with our pattern, and for some minutes no spoke.

Then I heard Alice say, in a low voi "What inclosures were there, Claude ? wha it that has vexed your father so much ?"

"Oh, only some rubbishy old bills," Claude impatiently ; "those Oxford tradesm are the greatest scoundrels on the face of earth ! It's always their way ! But the b plan is to take no notice of them ; shy their b into the fire, and leave them alone."

And, in spite of Alice's remonstrances, walked to the fireplace and thrust a roll of ters which he took from his pocket, into flames, and watched them turn to ashes.

"They will send them in again, Claude," Alice, gravely.

"Then I shall burn them again," he said, a laugh ; "the rascals ought to know better

"But are you quite sure they are wro Claude ?" she said, as they went back to window ; "are you quite sure you never bou any of the things ? Have you looked them c fully through ?"

"Oh, I know all about it," said Claude, vexed voice ; "do let it alone, dear. I h plenty of money to pay them all, if necessa so please leave me to manage my own affa There's a splendid leader in the Times to- Miss Trafford ; have you read it ?" he said, t ing to Evelyn, and beginning a conversat with her on the politics of Europe.

work out of her pocket, and sat on a low stool by the fire ; but she did not recover her usual good spirits for some time afterward.

From this time, as the spring advanced, Evelyn began to grow much stronger, and the doctors seemed very hopeful that she would soon be able entirely to leave off her invalid habits. She was strong enough to go up-stairs and down-stairs quite comfortably, and although she still spent a good deal of time on her couch, it was more because Sir William insisted upon it than because she felt it really necessary.

JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN.

S. S. Lesson for November 21st, Gen. 44 : 18–34, and 45. Golden Text, Rom. 12 : 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE time was approaching when the dreams of Joseph should meet with their full accomplishment. Ruler he was already, but till this ime his brethren knew nothing of his power nd glory, and there was no apparent probability that they would bow down to him. But God ad said it : " Hath He said, and shall He not do ? or hath He spoken, and shall He not make good ?" (Num. 23 : 19).

Thus it came to pass : " When Jacob saw that here was corn in Egypt, Jacob said unto his ons, Why do ye look one upon another ? And e said, Behold, I have heard that there is corn Egypt : get you down thither, and buy for s from thence ; that we may live, and not die." ut the old man's heart yearned upon his oungest son; the same principle which led him efore to give the preference to Joseph, now ade Benjamin to be his darling, whom he sent not with his brethren, for he said, Lest radventure mischief befall him." Might not ischief befall his other sons ? Alas ! Jacob s sowing bitterness among them. So the n brethren came down into Egypt, " and seph's brethren came, and bowed down themves before him with their faces to the earth." In their bitter hatred, when he had followed em to Dothan, they had said, when " they nspired against him to slay him," " We shall what will become of his dreams ;" and now dreams were in process of being fulfilled, and y were playing their part in the fulfilment in utmost unconsciousness. It is a greater sin n men know, to doubt the Word of the living d; he who does so acts as though he were God's erior, as though he knew better than his God. e fulfilment of His promises may seem to be ayed ; there may be facts which we cannot lerstand and reconcile ; but God is greater n His creatures ; He knows what He has sed to be written, and in the end He shall be ified when He speaks, and clear when He ges (Ps. 51 : 4).

Joseph knew his brethren, but they knew not ;" for he made himself strange to them. v should they recognize in the magnificent e of the governors of Egypt, him whom they for a slave ; they only could have done so they believed in his dreams. Just so with it is only by faith in His Word that we can ect our crucified Redeemer to come again in y. Joseph remembered his dreams ; probathey had been continually in his mind. At he exercised his power, accused his brethren eing spies, and questioned them as suspected ons, about their parents and their kindred. n he put them in ward three days, having proposed that one of them should be sent he land of Canaan to fetch their youngest her, Benjamin.

t on the third day he made another propon ; perhaps he had been praying over this er, and he decided to let them go, and carry for the famine of their households, but that should be bound as hostage in Egypt until should return and bring their brother Benn with them, as a proof they were not spies rue men. And thus they, who had so hardly with their brother, were made to taste the rness of injustice. " They said one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear ; therefore is this distress come upon us. . . . And they knew not that Joseph understood them ; for he spake unto them by an interpreter." His object was gained, and although outwardly he was not softened, for he bound Simeon before their eyes, yet he ordered their sacks to be filled with corn, and every man's money to be put in the mouth of his sack.

Their troubles did not end in Egypt. Not understanding Joseph's good intention in returning their money, it raised suspicion in their hearts, and they and their father were afraid ; and when they told him the stipulation by which alone they obtained consent to return to Egypt, that their brother Benjamin should go with them, he said, " Me have ye bereaved of my children : Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away : all these things are against me." Alas ! Jacob's faith was not strong enough, as Joseph's faith was, to bear him victorious over his trials. " All these things are against me," might have formed the motto of his life, while " the Lord was with him" might be that of Joseph. What is the prevailing thought in our lives : is it that persons and things, both present and future, are against us and overcome us ; or do we fear not, in the midst of real difficulty, because the Lord has said, " Fear not, for I am with thee ; be not dismayed, for I am thy God : I will strengthen thee, yea, I will help thee, yea I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness" (Isa. 41 : 10) ?

Hunger drove Jacob to retract his declaration that Benjamin should not go down to Egypt, and, like himself, Jacob, instead of committing all trustfully into God's hands, did what he could to obtain favor of the governor : he sent him a present, sent double money, lest the money restored were an oversight, and most unwillingly sent Benjamin with his brethren. They were unprepared for the reception they met with : the meeting with Simeon, the governor's friendly greeting, the banquet in his house, the mess of Benjamin—all was strange and unexpected : why should they, out of all who came to buy bread, be thus dealt with—they who had before been taken for spies ?

Their home journey was begun, and all seemed to have prospered, when a messenger from Joseph overtook them and brought home to them the charge of stealing his silver cup. Indignantly they refuted the charge, and offered that search should be made ; and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack. Now they suffered the bitter grief of false accusation, under which they had no means of justifying themselves ; circumstantial evidence was all against them ; they must take the draught which Joseph had drunk so deeply. But the worst of all was that the cup was found with Benjamin, and sentence was pronounced, that Benjamin should remain in Egypt to be Joseph's servant.

Then Judah came near unto Joseph and related to him the circumstances which had taken place in Canaan : his father's love for his youngest son, his loss of Benjamin's brother how, when they had related to the old man the decision of the Egyptian governor, that they should not see his face except his younger brother were with him ; how his father had said, " Ye know that my wife bore me two sons, and the one went from me, and I said, Surely he is torn in pieces ; and I saw him not since : and if ye take this also from me, and mischief befall him, ye shall bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave." And Judah urged that Jacob would surely die if Benjamin were not with them, and concluded, " Now, therefore, I pray thee, let thy servant abide instead of the lad, a bondman to my lord ; and let the lad go up with his brethren. . . ."

It was enough. " Then Joseph could not refrain himself before all them which stood by him ; and he cried, Cause every man to go out from before me, and there stood no man with him while Joseph made himself known unto his brethren." He said unto them, " I am Joseph : doth my father yet live ? and his brethren could not answer him, for they were troubled at his presence." Conscience was at work in them : a sin lay upon their consciences which had never been confessed and put away, and they did not even know how it could be set right. Joseph had a clear conscience, and a heart so filled with God's love to him that he could love those who did not love him ; and thus he reassured his brethren.

Those who live in the light of God have to set aside or ignore all personal considerations. Joseph said, " I am Joseph whom ye sold into Egypt. Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither, for God did send me before you to preserve life, . . . to preserve you a posterity on the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance. So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God. . . ." The recognition of the hand of God put Joseph in such a position that he could afford to forget the ill-will and hatred of his brethren. And, blessed be God, it is a glorious possibility to such as live the life of Christ, to bear warm love to those who bear only enmity to us, to overlook all that enmity on their side, and to see only the purpose of God which they have unconsciously been made to serve.

Joseph continued : " Haste ye, and go up to my father, and say unto him, Thus saith thy son Joseph, God hath made me lord of all Egypt : come down unto me, tarry not : and thou shalt dwell in the land of Goshen, and thou shalt be near unto me, . . . and there will I nourish thee (for yet there are five years of famine) ; lest thou and thy household, and all that thou hast come to poverty. And behold your eyes see, and the eyes of my brother Benjamin, that it is my mouth that speaketh unto you. And ye shall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt, and of all that ye have seen ; and ye shall haste and bring down my father hither." Then he wept on Benjamin's neck and after that he kissed all his brethren and wept upon their necks ; and " after that his brethren talked with him." At last all constraint was gone : they understood his undeserved love. Joseph's case was an exception in the Old Testament, but it is a foreshadowing of that blessed principle of the New Testament which is embodied in our golden text. " Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good.

" When Pharaoh heard that Joseph's brethren were come, it pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants." And the king commanded them through Joseph to lade their beasts and go into the land of Canaan, and to bring their father and all their households and come into the land of Egypt. He sent wagons to bring their wives and their little ones, and said, " Also regard not your stuff, for the good of all the land of Egypt is yours." So Joseph gave them wagons according to the commandment of Pharaoh, and gave them provision for the way. All that they would need was richly provided for them, and he parted from them with this injunction : " See that ye fall not out by the way." And they came into the land of Canaan and told Jacob, saying, Joseph is yet alive, and he is governor over all the land of Egypt. And Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not. And they told him all the words of Joseph, which he had said unto them, and when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob their father revived ; and Israel said, " It is enough · Joseph my son is yet alive ; I will go and see him before I die."

How many of God's children there are who are misunderstood, either by their own families or by brethren in Christ, among whom they are placed, and how often they seek by self justification or by dispute to maintain their ground. The history of Joseph teaches us how much better God does a thing than man can do it, and how He will not, cannot fail to maintain the cause of them that trust in Him, and who never seek to maintain their own cause.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Turkey is Making Energetic Preparations to resist any attack that may be made upon her by Greece and her allies. A dispatch from Constantinople says that the Porte has decided to raise the strength of the troops in Thessaly and Epirus to 42,000 men, and to construct ten batteries for the defence of the Dardanelles. It is remarkable that the Sultan, though unable to pay his tremendous debts, or even any portion of the interest upon them, seems to have no difficulty in finding money to defray the cost of war material. These active measures of protection render the outbreak of another war in the East increasingly probable, for the British Premier is remarkable for his pertinacity, and he is apparently resolved on Turkey obeying the will of Europe, cost what it may. Dulcigno has not yet been surrendered, and when that is done the claims of Greece must be considered. Then it will need all the skill of European diplomacy to avert a war, which we know from prophecy must come at a day not far distant.

The Irish Agitators were Served with their indictments last week. The intentions of the British Government were, to the last, kept a profound secret, and not until the criminal information was sworn on November 2d was the exact truth made public. Then it was found that fourteen of the leaders of the agitation are to be prosecuted. The names of Messrs. Parnell, Dillon, Biggar, and Sullivan, members of Parliament, are in the list. One of the defendants—a Mr. Boyton—intends pleading that he is an American citizen, but the plea will probably be disregarded, as in a former Fenian trial the same plea was ruled out by the judges. Mr. Nally, whose name also appears in the indictment, is the person who, in a recent speech near Tuam, recommended the use of dynamite and gun cotton against landlords. Mr. Parnell has expressed his conviction that the effect of the prosecution will be to create sympathy for the League, and cause greater enthusiasm among the members.

The charge against the defendants is that they have conspired to prevent payment of rents, to defeat legal process for the enforcement of rents, to prevent the letting of farms from which tenants have been evicted, and to excite ill-will between different classes of Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland.

The Character of "Irish Outrages" is not enough understood in this country. The regular correspondent of the New York Times writes : "In all parts of the west the most frightful things are done, not merely to intimidate the landlords, but to deter tenants from paying their rent. The threatening letters must be quite a source of revenue to the Post-Office. The business of intimidation is carried on with hideous regularity. First there is a gentle warning ; then comes a threatening letter marked with the emblems of death ; next, a hayrick or farm building is burned, or cattle or sheep are horribly mutilated, though why these inhuman fiends do not kill the poor creatures outright instead of cutting off their tails, gouging out their eyes, or hamstringing them, it is not easy to understand. Then comes the personal attack on the object of vengeance. He is visited at dead of night by gangs of men with blackened faces, who drag him out of bed in spite of the cries of his wife and children, and cut off his nose or ears, or perpetrate other brutalities too horrible to mention. Lastly, there is the ambush by the roadside, or at the cottage window, and the obnoxious man is shot dead or grievously wounded."

A hundred years ago people would not have believed that such things could go on under the degree of civilization which the world has now reached ; but the "more sure word of prophecy" (2 Pet. 1 : 19) gives us a true warning.

The British War with the Basutos, the South African tribe which rendered them such excellent service in their Zulu war, is proceeding vigorously. The Basutos, it is stated by Mr. Alexander Forbes, the renowned British war correspondent, are a proud race, whose quarrel with England arises solely from the fact that they desired to retain the arms they had purchased from the British, and had paid for, a request which Sir Bartle Frere considered he ought not to grant in view of the critical position of the British colonists. The British troops under Colonel Clarke stormed the Basuto stronghold on October 31st. The position is a natural fortress at the top of a celebrated mountain called Thaba Mosigo, which a former Basuto chief successfully defended against a formidable Zulu army by rolling immense stones down upon his advancing foes. Those tactics did not avail against the British force, and Colonel Clarke captured the stronghold. While the attack on the mountain was proceeding, five thousand Basutos attacked a British force in a neighboring village, and, before reinforcements could be brought up, defeated it with considerable loss in killed and wounded.

The French Government has Executed the decrees against the unauthorized religious orders. It was believed that with the expulsion of the Jesuits the administration would have ceased its efforts, but its principal members believe that the other monkish orders exercised an influence on French society almost as baneful as that of the Society of Jesus, and they have accordingly been expelled. A cablegram dated Paris, November 6th, says : "Yesterday the Dominicans, Capuchins, Marists, Oblates, and a number of other monastic orders in Paris were expelled. By this evening all will probably be finished except in Corsica and Algeria. The resistance of the monks was fully as determined here as in the provinces, but fortunately no blood was shed, as at Lyons and Nantes."

Dr. B. W. Richardson, the Eminent English physician and temperance advocate, presided a few weeks ago at a large meeting held to advocate the universal use of what is technically known in England as "whole meal bread." One of the speakers maintained that the bread in common use was forty per cent deficient in sustaining qualities. An entire grain of wheat contained everything that was required for nourishing purposes, and yet the better half of it was wasted, and this half was a much healthier food, especially for children. A white loaf, in fact, was only half a loaf, for a large portion of the material that formed muscular flesh, and nearly all that formed bone, were taken from it. Children fed on white bread were very liable to suffer from rickety bones, consumption, and bad teeth, because their food did not nourish them properly.

Pig-Sty Literature is the Epithet Applied by M. Rèveillaud, the distinguished French orator, to many of the books published in his native land. The French Government is now attempting to suppress this immoral literature. Last week the author of an immoral feuilleton was condemned to pay a fine of 500 francs and to undergo a year's imprisonment for the offence. A writer in the Republique Francaise, lamenting the fact that so many of its books are now republished abroad, says : "All our literature of imagination has fallen into discredit. The great reproach is that we are immoral. We are not read. People read our books less and less. Our melodramas and operettas constitute all that the world wishes to know of us, and Sarah Bernhardt is the incarnation of France for foreign curiosity."

The Australian Work of Rev. W. Taylor, the California evangelist, has been productive of permanent good. A prominent Australian journal thus speaks of that work in a recent issue : "No revival work in Australia ever left such permanent results as that of 'California' Taylor. Not a few of his converts fill our pulpits today ; scores of them are among our best and most faithful laymen, and hundreds in every colony were brought to God under his preaching." The portrait and life of this eminent evangelist appeared in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 19th.

The Seductiveness of Dancing is Exemplified in the following case of a young lady in England, who with genuine emotion testified to her conversion to Christ, and for a time ran well. But gradually she began to forsake the little band of Christians with whom she had been accustomed to meet for prayer and praise. Before uniting with the people of God she had been passionately fond of dancing, and of the society of those who, like her, enjoyed that beguiling amusement. The entreaties of her former pleasure-loving companions to renew the indulgences she had for a time abandoned prevailed ; and having once violated her solemn pledge, a repetition soon followed. Finally, at a public ball, she received a prize for the best performance in this so-called innocent amusement, ignoring "the prize of the high calling in Christ Jesus." It proved sufficient to sever her professed attachment to Christianity, resulting in entire absence from the house of God, in spiritual shipwreck, and, for aught we know, in eternal death !

A Burglary at Mr. Spurgeon's new Residence, at Upper Norwood, near London, took place on Sunday night, October 17th. The robbers plundered the study, and removed one or two valuables ; but the chief mischief done consisted in breaking boxes and cutting bags containing documents referring to the Orphanage and other public business. The broken dispatch-box and papers were found in the garden, the burglars being evidently much disappointe when they found their booty to be so useless t them. Mr. J. B. Gough had presented Mr. Spurgeon with an ebony cane, having an elaborately worked gold head. This was stolen, and the gold after being hammered and battered, was offered a a pawnbroker's in the neighborhood on Monda morning, and by eleven o'clock on that mornin a detective called on Mr. Spurgeon with th relics.

Suicides are Often Guilty of Stupid Folly, a they always are of gross wickedness. An illustration of this fact occurred in St. Petersbur recently. A young man staying at an hotel i that city ordered dinner one day to be served f two. He went to the railway station, evidentl to meet his expected friend. He returned to th hotel alone at dinner-time. As his door w fastened, and no reply could be got from withi the police were sent for. The young man w found stretched across the table shot throug the heart. On the table lay the photograph a young lady, and the fragments of a letter we found scattered about the floor. Another lett was found addressed to the proprietor of t hotel, saying that the writer had shot himself despair because the young lady whom he h been expecting had not kept her promise. H an hour afterward a letter arrived by mail fro the young lady herself, saying that she h missed the train and would be unable to co till the next day. On her arrival the followi morning she learned of the horrible act to whi her delay had prompted her foolish lover.

FIREMEN AND THEIR PERILS.

With Portrait and Life of Mr. Braidwood.

A Great Fire in London in 1861—James Braidwood, the Chief of the London Fire Brigade—Anecdotes of his Coolness and Bravery—His Death—Dr. Cumming's Testimony—A Man of Faith and Prayer—His Public Funeral—Description of the Aldersgate Street Fire—The Fire at Somers Town—Exciting Rescue of a young Woman by the Hair of Her Head—Death of Fireman Fitzgerald.

THE frequent occurrence of extensive and destructive fires has directed attention anew, and in a very forcible manner, to the subject of brave firemen and their perils. We therefore present our readers this week with a picture illustrative of the theme, including the portrait of Mr. Braidwood, the late captain of the London Fire Brigade, and a representation of the great and fatal conflagration which broke out on Friday, April 30, 1880, in Aldersgate Street, near the General Post Office, London—also the scene of the fire in Somers Town, London, on April 21, 1880, where fireman Fitzgerald was killed by the falling of a wall, together with a sketch of the public funeral with which the mortal remains of the brave man were honored.

On the afternoon of Saturday, June 22, 1861, a fire broke out in one of the riverside warehouses on the banks of the Thames, close to the Surrey side of London Bridge. The spectacle and the havoc were alike without parallel in the British metropolis since the great fire of 1666. The scene was one of marvellous magnificence, combined with features of terror and destruction. In spite of persistent efforts to extingush it, the conflagration raged until property was destroyed worth nearly two million pounds sterling. The spot was covered with huge piles of colossal buildings which were believed to be fireproof. Party-walls of immense thickness, staircases of stone, beams, pillars, and doors of massive iron, and other devices to insure safety, had been liberally employed; and yet in a few hours after the spontaneous combustion of a little hemp in one of these warehouses the fire gained such an appalling ascendency that if the providence of God had not preserved the summer calm of that terrible night, and turned the current of the light wind toward the river, nearly the whole of the south of London might have been destroyed.

Three acres of ground were gradually covered with a gigantic mass of fire, glowing and crackling at a white heat like a lake of molten iron. The coruscating saltpetre, the melted tallow falling in cascades of lurid flame from the loopholes of the various floors, the ignited tar, and many other combustibles stored in the consuming piles of buildings, ran with hissing haste, which deepened into a rushing roar, blazing into the adjacent river, until the Thames itself appeared to be covered with flames. Ships and barges were burned to the water's edge as well as houses, and the danger to life seemed almost as imminent on the flaming river as in the seething, stifling street. The glare of the conflagration was not only visible as a reflection, but strikingly conspicuous thirty miles distant.

Foremost in the perilous endeavor to subdue the fire on June 22d was the gallant and heroic captain of the Metropolitan Brigade, Mr. Braidwood, who fell a victim to his own intrepidity. The flames had been raging for several hours, and the men were showing signs of exhaustion, arising from the heat to which they were exposed, together with their Herculean efforts to arrest the career of the destroyer. He was in the act of administering some refreshment to them, when, with volcanic energy, a tremendous explosion took place just at the moment. A large wall fell solidly with a dreadful crash and buried him at the post of duty, beneath its ruins. His sudden death caused a perfect panic among the brigade, already distressed by the severity of their work; and yet they rushed bravely, but vainly, to his rescue. A continued succession of explosions drove them from the spot.

The fire continued to rage for three weeks, despite the thousands of tons of water which were poured upon it, and it was about six weeks from the outbreak before the basements and cellars were sufficiently cooled to allow of safe entrance and examination.

BIOGRAPHY OF MR. JAMES BRAIDWOOD.

James Braidwood was in many interesting respects a distinguished man. He was born in the city of Edinburgh, at the beginning of the century. His father was a highly respectable tradesman, who, valuing the worth of a liberal education, as most Scotchmen do, sent his son to the High School of the great northern capital, where in due course he completed the usual academical curriculum. At the comparatively early age of twenty-three he was intrusted with the superintendence of the city fire-engines, and at once organized a regular and most efficient fire brigade. His capacity for the important post was soon tested and commended. Scarcely had he matured his plans when the great fire of 1824 occurred, the most memorable and extensive in the annals of the Scotch metropolis, when part of Edinburgh High Street, including the steeple of the Tron Church, was burned down. On this occasion he displayed that complete self-possession in a scene of wild uproar and uncertainty, with the graceful and athletic dexterity and personal courage, for which he afterward became so remarkable.

But he gained more than local celebrity. Having published a well-written and thoroughly practical pamphlet on the "Training of Firemen, the Construction of Engines, the Causes of Fires, and the best Modes of proceeding to Extinguish them," his growing fame reached London. In the year 1832, therefore, we find him accepting the appointment of chief of that brigade which, by indomitable perseverance, tact, and kindness in carrying out necessary discipline, he raised to a completely organized and efficient standard. His influence over the one hundred and twenty men he commanded was such that they not only confided in his judgment, and with alacrity bounded to execute his commissions, but truly loved him. Hence, to a considerable extent, the wonderful success of his hazardous efforts. For thirty years before his death his name was constantly before the public in connection with the ravaged buildings and reddened sky of the British capital.

Various anecdotes are current respecting Mr. Braidwood's singular coolness and courage in perilous circumstances, and of the beneficial effect which his invariably calm demeanor produced upon the affrighted inmates of dwellings on fire, trembling women, and terrified children, while directing them from the scene of danger. He has been known to descend into cellars containing gunpowder, the explosion of which would have made havoc with property, and perhaps have been fatal to life. Wrapping wet blankets around the barrels, he carried them in his arms through fire and smoke, one after another.

On one occasion he saved a little child from apparently inevitable destruction by walking across a plank to the room in which it lay unconscious of jeopardy, while the flames were raging madly beneath him. But though no one could exhibit more daring than himself, he was conspicuous for watching over the movements of his men, and would not allow them to take up a position or enter a building until he was satisfied that they were not exposing themselves to any unnecessary risks. He did not go through his experiences scathless, for in the year 1831 he narrowly escaped the fate which ultimately befell him, being struck down by some fragments of a falling roof, and so much injured that he had to be removed immediately to his home.

Thirty years afterward, on June 22d, in the above-mentioned great fire of London, the fatal moment came to the heroic captain—a moment often thought of and happily prepared for. Though he was a man of no ordinary mind, as the valuable papers he contributed to the Institution of Civil Engineers abundantly prove, yet the crowning feature of his character was his Christianity. The Rev. Dr. Cumming (of whose congregation Mr. Braidwood had been a consistent and generous member for upward of fifteen years) thus spoke of him:

"He who has gone was, I am sure, ripe to go. In our committees connected with our schools, ragged schools, day schools, Sunday-schools, his presence was welcomed by all his brethren; and his combination of good sense, of true piety, of thorough efficiency were such, that I fear we shall not soon see his like again. But what is lost to the church below we rejoice to say has gone to the church above."

The activity and energy displayed in the important post he filled were equally apparent in his Christian character. While active beyond most in the service of his fellow-men, he remembered that his energies and powers were demanded for God. His Christianity was that which shone forth in daily duties.

It is said by those who knew him intimately that he never entered upon his arduous and dangerous duties without commending himself and his men to the protecting care of God. He has been heard to say that in the midst of the dangers to which he was continually exposed he felt he could not proceed without casting himself upon God. There were moments in which he could only cry, "Help, Lord, help; for vain is the help of man." Thus he was a man of prayer. The vigor and liveliness of his faith may be seen in the words he uttered to his family shortly before his death—those earnest words of the apostle, "To me to live is Christ, and to die is gain." It is said that he locked for death in his labors; and, as tending to show the readiness of his soul for the event, he regarded sudden death as a mercy, often remarking that "sudden death is sudden glory." How moving the thought that in what is commonly spoken of as his melancholy end he apparently realized the fulfilment of the desire of his heart!

His funeral was that of a great chieftain, rendered so by the unaffected sympathy and spontaneous admiration of the people, for never since the remains of the Duke of Wellington were conveyed to St. Paul's Cathedral, in 1852, did such a crowd attend upon the dead in the London streets on the way to the last resting-place.

THE ALDERSGATE STREET FATAL FIRE OF APRIL 30, 1880.

The top right-hand portion of our engraving represents a scene which was witnessed at the fatal fire in Aldersgate Street, London, on Friday April 30th last. The fire, which was remarkable for its destructiveness, originated, it is believed, in an explosion on the premises of some wholesale chemists and druggists. Owing to the vast quantities of inflammable and combustible substances stored in the warehouse, the flames enveloped the first and second stories before the occupants of the latter had time to effect their escape. Consequently a scene of a very painful and exciting character was witnessed by the vast crowd of persons who speedily assembled in the streets. The time of this outbreak was the middle of the day.

Five or six workmen rushed to the windows and shrieked wildly for help. There was no time to fetch the fire-escape—which arrived afterward, when it was too late—as the flames were rapidly gaining upon the unfortunate supplicants, and there was no ladder at hand. In the absence of any instant means of rescue, the crowd shouted to the men to jump, as there was no alternative for them but to risk the consequences of a perilous leap or suffer a terrible death. Seizing a tarpaulin from a van that had been stopped in its progress by the outbreak of the fire, some of the bystanders spread it out for the men to fall upon. One of the men then sprang upon it from the window, and escaped with only a slight shaking. Another also jumped, and was caught in a similar manner. Immediately afterward, however, another and a more violent explosion occurred, shattering the interior of the house so that the floors sank in, and renewed flames shot through the windows and above the roof. The appalling truth was then evident to all the terrified bystanders, that helpless men and boys were lost in the fiery c sm below. By this time the buildings upon w ch the disaster had originated were utterly d royed, a fallen wreck of incandescent rubbish f d the space on which they had stood. A gether four men and boys were burned to d th in this conflagration.

EMAN FITZGERALD'S HEROIC DEATH ON APRIL 21.

he lower portion of our picture represents th fire in Somers Town, London, on April 21. T inhabitants had the greatest difficulty in es ping from the burning premises. One young w an was at a top front window, surrounded by s ke and flame, and as a fire-escape man named G ch ascended the ladder she was seen to fall ba ward. At that moment Gooch reached the w low, and succeeded in drawing up the girl by he hair of her head, half suffocated, and b ght her down the escape in safety.

e entire building was now in flames, and th firemen who had arrived were busily empl ed in their efforts to extinguish them. A m named Fitzgerald was holding the hose, wh suddenly a rumbling sound was heard, imme ately followed by the falling forward of the wh e frontage of the building into the street, and be e Fitzgerald could escape he was knocked do by the débris and buried in the ruins. Police an firemen at once set to work to extricate the un rtunate man, and in a few minutes he was got out but as several tons of brickwork had fallen up him, he was quite dead. A view is also gi of the funeral cortége of Fitzgerald passing gton Green, on its way to the cemetery. A si ar procession follows the corpse of every Lo on fireman who falls at the post of duty.

By a London Clergyman.

SQUIRE ARMITAGE,

(A Tale in Two Chapters.)

CHAPTER I.

I wanted to bring up before the eyes of a us foreigner a right royal specimen of an shman, Squire Armitage would be the man f choice. Six feet high, broad-shouldered, movement marked with the most exquisite and ease; a kindly heart, and a smile would disarm almost any enemy alive, I d like to know where a better could be ?

T Squire was a country gentleman, and a broad acre could he point to as his own, his father's before him. There wasn't a land-owner in the country. As far as the uld reach—north, south, east, and west, Brooklands, his seat—did his property ex-

, good-tempered and genial as Squire age was, he was not without his crotchets. ike all other very kind-hearted men, he was get very heated indeed when he was roused. so passionate a man, we all know, as he arely loses his temper.

two crotchets, which rose high over every were his disgust of poachers and teetotal- rs. It was an unlucky day for that poacher as brought before the bench when Squire age presided there. The very hardest sen- permitted by the law was pretty sure to be e passed upon him. While, as for teeto- , he used to say, "If I were a member of ouse of Commons I would bring in a bill eir extermination as pests and vermin." here can be no doubt that he would have o if he had had the opportunity.

truth was, the Squire had met with some oor specimens of abstainers. He had a tee- servant once, who turned out a perfect , and some of the village advocates, while ing up example most earnestly in the mat- abstaining from strong drink, quite forgot a good example in charity and kindness rgiveness of injuries.

had an idea too that, in some dim way or ale was at the bottom of England's great- and that any attempt to change the national beverage would bring his grand erect old country to her knees. At any rate, from whatever cause or causes his hatred derived its existence, nothing could be surer than the fact that toward teetotallers he had not a particle of love to spare: and he manifested his hatred not only by harsh words, but also by harsh deeds. For instance, when the village society sought to purchase a piece of land for a temperance room, he stoutly and angrily refused, while more than one eligible man was refused a farm on his estate simply because of his teetotal principles.

I think now I need say no more about Squire Armitage's opinion of teetotalism. I trust he stands out full and clear before your mind. A great and good man in a thousand ways, but in this one particular warped tremendously awry.

Let us now launch out into the subject of my story—"Squire Armitage, and his Remedies for Intemperance."

THE DINNER PARTY.

A thoroughly select little gathering it was, where everybody knew each other, and everybody was at ease. While some were good talkers, the rest were good listeners, so that from the clash of minds, and the eloquence of admiring nods, many a bright spark flashed forth.

Among other subjects was discussed that of drunkenness. Who started it nobody knew; but once taken up, it was argued with the utmost warmth. All were not of the same mind. So far from this being the case, most seemed to be of different opinions.

Could drunkenness be cured? If so, how? This was the form the subject took, after some irregular remarks from one and the other. It was in connection with the remedy that minds differed. Some argued fervently for better dwellings for the poor; their miserable houses, they thought, lay at the root of the whole evil. Others would have it that education was the grand remedy for the terrible disease of drunkenness.

"Men get drunk," said one, "because they know no better. Enlarge their minds. Teach them self-respect, and you cut down to the very roots of the disease."

"No such thing," chimed in still another; "what is wanted is some counter-attraction for the public house. Give them music and amusements elsewhere, and you'll soon find the public houses emptied."

Such were the views of Squire Armitage's guests. Strange to say, there was not one who pleaded for total abstinence. It was a remedy quite overlooked by all. It was clearly considered too outrageous even to mention. After everybody had had their say, Squire Armitage, for the first time, opened his mouth.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," he said. "It seems to me there's truth in all that you have said. I'll try your remedies in my own village here; and I'll begin at once."

A little hum of pleased applause greeted these words; and, after the question was a little further discussed, the party broke up.

Now Squire Armitage was a man of his word, and when he took up a thing, spared neither pains nor money in carrying it through. Day and night he brooded over this project, and lost no time in setting about its performance. How it succeeded we will show by and by.

BROTHER AND SISTER.

"Hallo, Polly! what on earth are you looking so sad about? Have you seen a ghost?"

So spoke George Armitage, the squire's only son. A fine young fellow was George, and the pride and joy of his father's heart. Polly was his only sister, and a year or two younger.

"I've seen something worse than a ghost, George."

"Why, Polly! it must have been something very bad then," he jokingly responded.

"It was bad—very bad," she said in the same sad tone. "I will tell you what I saw. Last night at twelve o'clock, hearing an unsteady tramping outside the hall door, I looked down from my window. The moon was shining very clearly, so that I was not deceived in what I saw George, I saw a young man reeling in drunkenness, his face flushed, his hair disordered, his hat half off. I heard him muttering dreadful curses. He came into this very house, George. Oh! it makes my blood run cold when I think that that man—that drunkard—was my brother."

George Armitage for a moment or two looked at the pattern on the carpet, tracing it out with his foot. When he ventured to lift his eyes to his sister's face he saw two large tears rolling down her pale cheeks, and an expression of such unutterable sadness sitting there that it pierced him to the heart.

"Polly," he said, "I know I made a beast of myself. I assure you it shall be the last time. I never knew till I got up from Markham's table that I had taken too much. I promise you I'll be from henceforth only a moderate drinker."

Polly had heard other promises very like this, and so derived very small comfort from it. She now determined to put his penitence to the severest test she had ever yet ventured to propose.

"George," she said, "how many promises like this have you already broken? Tell me candidly, do you really think you will be able to keep this one?"

The young man replied frankly, "Well, I will tell you the plain truth. I really mean to keep these promises when I make them, but somehow one sip of wine knocks me quite over. I fear very much you'll see me drunk again."

There was silence for a moment or two. His sister then made her long-thought-of proposal.

"George, you have often said you would do anything in the world to please me. I am going to ask you to do one thing which I know will cost you a good deal. Will you, dear brother, give up drinking strong drink altogether? Will you do it with me?"

"Why, Polly!" he exclaimed with surprise, "what would father say were he to know it? However, to please you I'll do it."

"George," she said softly, "I've long prayed to God for this. But you are not going to try in your own strength, are you?"

The brother looked somewhat staggered at this. He had not bargained for religion too. He saw, however, that mere resolution was not enough, so he promised his sister faithfully that he would fight this battle upon his knees.

"I'll begin to pray too," he said, with a little quiver in his voice.

"Shall we begin now, then?" pleaded Polly with some hesitation, as though she feared she was going too far.

His only answer was to fall upon his knees and bury his head in his hands.

What would the world have said had it known that the two children of Squire Armitage had become pledged abstainers from strong drink?

They decided to keep the matter wholly from their father, and while they would permit their glasses to be filled at dinner as usual, it should be with toast and water. Polly was such a favorite with all the servants that she knew their secret was safe with them. Indeed, the old butler, who had known them both from childhood, had fretted himself almost ill at the wildness of Mr. George, and would therefore be certain to fall in most cordially with the plot. And so it proved.

(To be concluded.)

Rev. Arthur J. Webb, of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, Levuka, Fiji, writing to the Committee of the Bible Society, says: "Your last consignment of Testaments have all disappeared, being bought eagerly as soon as the cases were opened; and still there is a great demand. From the provinces the demand is large; incessant are the applications made for Testaments. Planters apply for them on behalf of Fijians who work for them, and stipulate that part of their pay shall be in this form. A planter who openly vaunts his disbelief in God, the Bible, and a future life, wrote for a Bible for one of his Fijian laborers, and afterward offered to receive a number of copies, and supply the natives with them."

THE SLAUGHTER OF YOUNG MEN.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, November 14, 1880.

"As an ox to the Slaughter."—PROV. 7:22.

The Ox Goes Unwittingly to Death—Young Men Driven by Temptation to Ruin—I. Young Men Slaughtered by Society—The Meaning of Unpayable Debt—Worse than Robbery—Vagabond Debtors—"A Paragraph from my own Experience"—A Graphic Description of a Debtor's Misery—II. Slaughtered by Irreligion—How a Young Man's Bible may be Captured—After that he is Defenceless—Infidelity the Meanest of all Larcenies—Where are the Slaughtered?—How to Stop the Slaughter—Arm Yourself—Have a Sanctum—Be not Discouraged by Poverty—Herschel's Youth—The God-given Outfit—The Panoply of Heaven—A Young Englishman at the Tabernacle—Ole Bull's Gold Watch.

THERE is nothing in the voice or manner of the butcher to indicate to the ox that there is death ahead. The ox thinks he is going on to a rich pasture-field of clover where all day long he will revel in the herbaceous luxuriance; but after a while the men and the boys close in upon him with sticks and stones and shouting, and drive him through bars and into a doorway where he is fastened, and with well-aimed stroke the axe fells him; and so the anticipation of the redolent pasture-field is completely disappointed. So many a young man has been driven on by temptation to what he thought would be paradisiacal enjoyment; but after a while influences with darker hue and swarthier arm close in upon him, and he finds that instead of making an excursion into a garden, he has been driven "as an ox to the slaughter."

I. We are apt to blame young men for being destroyed when we ought to blame the influences that destroy them.

a great many young men by the behest, "You must keep up appearances; whatever be your salary, you must dress as well as others, you must wine and brandy as many friends, you must smoke as costly cigars, you must give as expensive entertainments, and you must live in as fashionable a boarding-house. If you haven't the money, borrow. If you can't borrow, make a false entry, or subtract here and there a bill from a bundle of bank bills; you will only have to make the deception a little while; in a few months, or in a year or two, you can make all right. Nobody will be hurt by it, nobody will be the wiser. You yourself will not be damaged." By that awful process a hundred thousand men have been slaughtered for time and slaughtered for eternity.

Suppose you borrow. There is nothing wrong about borrowing money. There is hardly a man in the house but has sometimes borrowed money. Vast estates have been built on a borrowed dollar. But there are two kinds of borrowed money: Money borrowed for the purpose of starting, or keeping up legitimate enterprise and expense, and money borrowed to get that which you can do without. The first is right, the other is wrong. If you have money enough of your own to buy a coat, however plain, and then you borrow money for a dandy's outfit, you have taken the first revolution of the wheel down grade. Borrow for the necessities; that may be well. Borrow for the luxuries; that tips your prospects over in the wrong direction.

The Bible distinctly says the borrower is servant of the lender. It is a bad state of things when you have to go down some other street to escape meeting some one whom you owe. If young men knew what is the despotism of being in debt, more of them would keep out of it. What did debt do for Lord Bacon, with a mind towering above the centuries? It induced him to take bribes and convict himself as a criminal before all ages. What did debt do for Walter Scott? Broken hearted at Abbotsford. Kept him writing until his hand gave out in paralysis to keep the sheriff away from his pictures and statuary. Better for him if he had minded the maxim which he had chiselled over the fireplace at Abbotsford, "Waste not, want not."

The trouble is, my friends, that people do not understand the ethics of going in debt, and that if you purchase goods with no expectation of paying for them, or go into debts which you cannot meet, you steal just so much money. If I go into a grocer's store and I buy sugars and coffees and meats with no capacity to pay for them, and no intention of paying for them, I am more dishonest than if I go into the store, and when the grocer's face is turned the other way I fill my pockets with the articles of merchandise and carry off a ham! In the one case I take the merchant's time, and I take the time of his messenger to transfer the goods to my house, while in the other case I take none of the time of the merchant, and I wait upon myself, and I transfer the goods without any trouble to him! In other words, a sneak thief is not so bad as a man who contracts for debts he never expects to pay.

Yet, in all our cities there are families that move every May day to get into proximity to other grocers and meat shops and apothecaries. They owe everybody within half a mile of where they now live, and next May they will move into a distant part of the city, finding a new lot of victims. Meanwhile, you, the honest family in the new house, are bothered day by day by the knocking at the door of disappointed bakers, and butchers, and dry goods dealers, and newspaper carriers, and you are asked where your predecessor is. You do not know. It was arranged you should not know. Meanwhile, your predecessor has gone to some distant part of the city, and the people who have anything to sell have sent their wagons and stopped there to solicit the "valuable" custom of the new neighbor, and he, the new neighbor, with great complacency and with an air of affluence, orders the finest steaks and the highest-priced sugars, and the best of the canned fruits, and perhaps all the newspapers —Eagle, Argus, Herald, Sun, Tribune, World, and Times! And the debts will keep on accumulating until he gets his goods on the 30th of next April in the furniture cart.

Now, let me say, if there are any such persons in the house this morning, if you have any regard for your own conscience you had better move to some greatly distant part of the city. If, for instance, you live in South Brooklyn, move to the Eastern District, or Greenpoint; or if you live in this central part of Brooklyn, move to New York or Jersey City! It is too bad that, having had all the trouble of consuming the goods, you should also have all the trouble of being dunned! And let me say if you find that this pictures your own photograph, instead of being in church you ought to be in the penitentiary! No wonder that so many of our merchants fail in business. They are swindled into bankruptcy by these wandering Arabs, these Nomads of city life. They cheat the grocer out of the green apples which make them sick, the physician who attends them during their distress, and the undertaker who fits them out for departure from the neighborhood where they owe everybody when they pay the debt of nature, the only debt they ever do pay!

Now our young men are coming up in this depraved state of commercial ethics, and I am solicitous about them. I want to warn them against being slaughtered on the sharp edges of debt. You want many things you have not, my young friends. You shall have them if you have patience and honesty and industry. Certain lines of conduct always lead out to certain successes.

There is a law which controls even those things that seem haphazard. I have been told by those who have observed that it is possible to calculate just how many letters will be sent to the Dead Letter Office every year through misdirection; that it is possible to calculate just how many letters will be detained for lack of postage stamps through the forgetfulness of the senders, and that it is possible to tell just how many people will fall in the streets by slipping on an orange peel. In other words, there ar accidents. The most insignificant event ever heard of is the link between two eternit the eternity of the past and the eternity of future. Head the right way, young man, you will came out at the right goal.

Bring me a young man and tell me wha physical health is, and what his mental cal and what his habits, and I will tell you will be his destiny for this world, and his des for the world to come, and I will not make inaccurate prophecies out of the five hun All this makes me solicitous in regard to y men, and I want to make them nervous i gard to the contraction of unpayable debt give you a paragraph from

I afraid of getting worldly under so much perity! I resolved to invite all the congreg to my house in groups of twenty-five each. began, and as they were the best congreg in all the world, and we felt nothing was good for them, we piled all the luxuries or table. I never completed the undertaking. the end of six months I was in financial des I found that we not only had not the surpl luxuries, but we had a struggle to get the n sities, and I learned what every young learns in time to save himself, or too late, you must measure the size of a man's bod fore you begin to cut the cloth for his coat

When a young man wilfully and of ch having the comforts of life, goes into the traction of unpayable debts, he knows not what he goes. The creditors get after debtor, the pack of hounds in full cry, and for the reindeer. They jingle his doorbe fore he gets up in the morning, they jing doorbell after he has gone to bed at night. meet him as he comes off his front steps. send him a postal card, or a letter, in c style, telling him to pay up. They attac goods. They want cash, or a note at days, or a note on demand. They call knave. They say he lies. They want him plined at the church. They want him t out of the b nk. They come at him fro side, and from that side, and from before from behind, and from above, and fro neath, and he is insulted, and gibbeted, and and dunned, and sworn at, until he get nervous dyspepsia, gets neuralgia, gets complaint, gets heart disease, gets conv disorder, gets consumption.

Now he is dead, and you say, "Of cours will let him alone." Oh, no! Now the watchful to see whether there are any un sary expenses at the obsequies, to see w there is any uselesss handle on the casket, whether there is any surplus plait on the sh to see whether the hearse is costly or che see whether the flowers sent to the casket been bought by the family or donated, to whose name the deed to the grave is mad Then they ransack the bereft household books, the pictures, the carpets, the chair sofa, the piano, the mattresses, the pillo which he died. Cursed be debt! For th of your own happiness, for the sake of your morals, for the sake of your immortal so God's sake, young man, as far as possible out of it.

II. But I think more young men are

SLAUGHTERED THROUGH IRRELIGION

Take away a young man's religion an make him the prey of evil. We all kno the Bible is the only perfect system of m Now, if you want to destroy the young morals, take his Bible away. How will y that? Well, you will caricature his reve for the Scriptures, you will take all those dents of the Bible which can be made mirt Jonah's whale, Samson's foxes, Adam's then you will caricature eccentric Christia inconsistent Christians, then you will pass our own all those hackenyed arguments against hristianity which are as old as Tom Paine, as d as Voltaire, as old as sin. Now, you have ptured his Bible, and you have taken his rongest fortress; the way is comparatively clear, d all the gates of his soul are set open in in- ation to the sins of earth and the sorrows of ath, that they may come in and drive the ke for their encampment.

A steamer fifteen hundred miles from shore th broken rudder and lost compass, and hulk king fifty gallons the hour, is better off than young man when you have robbed him of his ble. Have you ever noticed how despicably an it is to take away the world's Bible without posing a substitute. It is meaner than to me to a sick man and steal his medicine, aner than to come to a cripple and steal his tch, meaner than to come to a pauper and al his crust, meaner than to come to a poor n and burn his house down. It is steal the Bible which has been crutch and dicine and food and eternal home to so many. hat a generous and magnanimous business in- elity has gone into! This splitting up of life- ts, and taking away of fire escapes, and ex- guishing of lighthouses.

come out and I say to such people, "What you doing all this for?" "Oh!" they say, ust for fun." It is such fun to see Christians to hold on to their Bibles! Many of them e lost loved ones, and have been told that re is a resurrection, and it is such fun to tell m there will be no resurrection! Many of m have believed that Christ came to carry burdens and to heal the wounds of the ld, and it is such fun to tell them they will e to be their own saviour! Think of the nest thing you ever heard of; then go down ousand feet underneath it, and you will find rself at the top of a stairs a hundred miles g; go to the bottom of the stairs, and you will a ladder a thousand miles long; then go to foot of the ladder and look off a precipice as far as from here to China, and you will the headquarters of the meanness that would this world of its only comfort in life, its only ce in death, and its only hope for immor- y. Slaughter a young man's faith in God, there is not much more left to slaughter.

ow, what has become of the slaughtered? l, some of them are in their father's or her's house, broken down in health, waiting ie; others are in the hospital, others are in enwood, or, rather, their bodies are, for their s have gone on to retribution. Not much pect for a young man who started life with l health, and good education, and a Chris- example set him, and opportunity of useful- , who gathered all his treasures and put them ne box, and then dropped it into the sea.

ow, how is this wholesale slaughter to be ped. There is not a person in the house but terested in that question.

YOUNG MAN, ARM YOURSELF.

object of my sermon this morning is to put apon in each of your hands for your own de- e. Wait not for Young Men's Christian As- tions to protect you, or churches to protect Appealing to God for help, take care of self.

rst, have a room somewhere that you can your own. Whether it be the back parlor fashionable boarding house, or a room in ourth story of a cheap lodging, I care not. have that one room your fortress. Let not lissipater or unclean step over the threshold. ey come up the long flight of stairs and k at the door, meet them face to face and y yet firmly refuse them admittance. Have family portraits on the wall, if you brought with you from your country home. Have le on the stand. If you can afford it and can play on one, have an instrument of c—harp, or flute, or cornet, or melodeon, lin, or piano. Every morning before you that room, pray. Every night after you home in that room, pray. Make that room your Gibraltar, your Sebastopol, your Mount Zion. Let no bad book or newspaper come into that room any more than you would allow a cobra to coil on your table.

Take care of yourself. Nobody else will take care of you. Your help will not come up two, or three, or four flights of stairs; your help will come through the roof, down from heaven, from that God who in the six thousand years of the world's history never betrayed a young man who tried to be good and a Christian. Let me say in regard to your adverse worldly circumstances, in passing, that you are on a level now with those who are finally to succeed. Mark my words, young man, and think of it thirty years from now. You will find that those who thirty years from now are the millionaires of this country, who are the orators of the country, who are the poets of the country, who are the strong merchants of the country, who are the great philanthropists of the country—mightiest in church and state—are this morning on a level with you, not an inch above, and you in straitened circumstances now.

Herschel earned his living by playing a violin at parties, and in the interstices of the play he would go out and look up at the midnight heavens, the fields of his immortal conquests. George Stephenson rose from being the foreman in a colliery to be the most renowned of the world's engineers.

NO OUTFIT,

no capital to start with! young man, go down to the Mercantile Library and get some books and read of what wonderful mechanism God gave you in your hand, in your foot, in your eye, in your ear, and then ask some doctor to take you into the dissecting room and illustrate to you what you have read about, and never again commit the blasphemy of saying you have no capital to start with. Equipped! Why, the poorest young man in this house is equipped as only the God of the whole universe could afford to equip him. Then his body—a very poor affair compared with his wonderful soul—Oh, that is what makes me solicitous. I am not so much anxious about you, young man, because you have so little to do with, as I am anxious about you because you have so much to risk, and lose or gain.

There is no class of persons that so stir my sympathies as young men in great cities. Not quite enough salary to live on, and all the temptations that come from that deficit. Invited on all hands to drink, and their exhausted nervous system seeming to demand stimulus. Their religion caricatured by the most of the clerks in the store, and most of the operatives in the factory. The rapids of temptation and death rushing against that young man forty miles the hour, and he in a frail boat headed up stream, with nothing but a broken oar to work with. Unless Almighty God help them they will go under.

Ah! when I told you to take care of yourself you misunderstood me if you thought I meant you are to depend upon human resolution, which may be dissolved in the foam of the wine cup, or may be blown out with the first gust of temptation. Here is the helmet, the sword of the Lord God Almighty. Clothe yourself in that panoply, and you shall not be put to confusion. Sin pays well neither in this world nor the next, but right thinking, and right believing, and right acting will take you in safety through this life and in transport through the next.

I never shall forget a prayer I heard a young man make some fifteen years ago. It was a very short prayer, but it was a tremendous prayer: "Oh! Lord, help us. We find it so very easy to do wrong and so hard to do right, Lord help us." That prayer, I warrant you, reached the ear of God, and reached His heart. And there are in this house this morning a hundred men who have found out—a thousand young men, perhaps, who have found out that very thing. It is so very easy to do wrong, and so hard to do right.

I got a letter last night, only one paragraph of which I shall read:

"Having moved around somewhat, I have run across many young men of intelligence, ardent strivers after that will-o'-the-wisp—fortune—and of one of these I would speak. He was of twenty-three or four years, who came to New York, where he had no acquaintances, with barely sufficient to keep him a couple of weeks. He had been tenderly reared, perhaps I should say too tenderly, and was not used to earning his living, and found it extremely difficult to get any position that he was capable of filling. After many vain efforts in this direction he found himself on a Sunday evening in Brooklyn, near your church, with about three dollars left of his small capital. Providence seemed to lead him to your door, and he determined to go in and hear you.

"He told me his going to hear you that night was undoubtedly the turning point in his life, for when he went into your church he felt desperate, but while listening to your discourse his better nature got the mastery. I truly believe from what this young man told me that your sounding the depths of his heart that night alone brought him back to his God whom he was so near leaving."

The echo that is of multitudes in the house this morning. I am not preaching an abstraction, but a great reality. Oh! friendless young man, Oh! prodigal young man, Oh! broken-hearted young man, discouraged young man, wounded young man, I commend to you Christ this day, the best friend a man ever had. He meets you this morning. You have come here for this blessing. Despise not that emotion rising in your soul; it is divinely lifted. Look into the face of Christ. Lift one prayer to your father's God, to your mother's God, and this morning get the pardoning blessing. Now, while I speak, you are at the forks of the road, and this is the right road, and that is the wrong road and I see you start on the right road.

Last Sabbath morning, at the close of the service, I saw a gold watch of the world-renowned and deeply-lamented violinist, Ole Bull. You remember he died last summer in his island home off the coast of Norway. That gold watch he had wound up day after day through his last illness, and then he said to his companion, "Now, I want to wind this watch as long as I can, and then when I am gone I want you to keep it wound up until it gets to my friend, Dr. Doremus, in New York, and then he will keep it wound up until his life is done, and then I want the watch to go to his young son, my especial favorite."

The great musician who more than any other artist had made the violin speak and sing and weep and laugh and triumph—for it seemed when he drew the bow across the strings as if all earth and heaven shivered in delighted sympathy—the great musician, in a room looking off upon the sea, and surrounded by his favorite instruments of music, closed his eyes in death. While all the world was mourning at his departure, sixteen crowded steamers fell into line of funeral procession to carry his body to the mainland. There were fifty thousand of his countrymen gathered in an amphitheatre of the hills waiting to hear the eulogium, and it was said when the great orator of the day with stentorian voice began to speak, the fifty thousand people on the hillsides burst into tears.

Oh! that was the close of a life that had done so much to make the world happy. But I have to tell you, young man, if you live right and die right, that was a tame scene compared with that which will greet you when from the galleries of heaven the one hundred and forty and four thousand shall accord with Christ in crying, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." And the influences that on earth you put in motion will go down from generation to generation, the influences you wound up handed to your children, and their influences wound up and handed to their children, until watch and clock are no more needed to mark the progress, because time itself shall be no longer.

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

The Hymn—A New Guest—A Horrible Suspicion Crosses Cecil's Mind—The Meeting of Husband and Wife—Pride still Powerful—Miss Calvert taken into Salome's Confidence—And is Startled by a Strange Revelation.

AFTER this first day it became a regular employment of Salome Stanley on Sunday mornings to attend the free breakfasts at the Albert Street Mission Hall, and as regularly to entertain the motley company by her glorious voice during the interval that elapsed between their entrance and the completion of the breakfast preparations.

Spring had come, the air grew softer and more balmy, and in a week or two the last of the breakfasts would be held for the season. The crowd that had gathered in the keen frosty mornings of the depth of winter, in such vast numbers as to be both overwhelming and perplexing to the managers of the breakfasts, who could not possibly admit all of them, no longer troubled them. The hall was well filled still, but the cases of extreme distress were less numerous and heartrending. It does not seem quite so terrible to send a death-struck haggard man or a destitute woman and her children out into a sunny soft spring day, to find a living on the morrow as they best can, as to send them forth into the cold and comfortless streets for many dreary winter hours.

Salome had, as usual, begun to sing, standing in her accustomed place by the side of Miss Calvert, as that lady presided at the harmonium,

"Oh! what shall the harvest be?
Oh! what shall the harvest be?"

She had reached this sad refrain of the first verse of a very favorite hymn when the door was pushed open, and a stranger was admitted by Cecil, who stood at the entrance, to claim the hospitality of the mission.

A man of about thirty years, with destitution and dissipation written on every feature of the blotched, diseased face, in every fold of the greasy, dingy, threadbare garments, and in every movement of the feeble, tottering limbs, yet with a reckless gayety about him, a careless attempt at easy superiority, that served to make only a more miserable exhibition of his degradation, and brought it into a much stronger light.

He seated himself as far from his next neighbor on the bench as might be, glanced superciliously around at the other occupants of the room, and then his bleared eyes caught sight of the lovely singer standing in her purity and sweetness before them all. She had paused at his entrance, some little interruption having taken place with the crying baby of a poor woman in the front row; the infant being quieted, she began again to sing.

Was Cecil mistaken, or did the man start violently? Certainly he quickly covered his face with his hands. A horrible suspicion came over the mind of Cecil Anerley.

Salome Stanley continued to sing; the assembly helped her at the chorus. Now her eyes were turned that way—to the very place where the man sat.

Cecil's fascinated gaze watched her every movement intently, anxious for the effect upon her. She appeared to look at him, but only momentarily, only casually, as at any other, and then her glance was turned away again.

"Thank Heaven!" Cecil murmured devoutly to himself. "I am wrong." What a relief it was.

"Sowing the seed of a lingering pain,
Sowing the seed of a maddened brain,
Sowing the seed of a tarnished name,
Sowing the seed of eternal shame.
Oh! what shall the harvest be?
Oh! what shall the harvest be?"

The man moved uneasily in his seat as the words, clearly and earnestly sung, clove the air around him.

Cecil left the room to superintend the breakfast arrangements, and then came back again. Presently Salome followed one of the attendants who carried an immense basket of bread, and distributed the food to the people as she passed along between the seats. She it was who came to the row where the new-comer still sat covering his face with his hands. His next neighbor gave him a nudge.

"Wake up, mate; the lady's a comin'."

He turned carelessly, with a half-offended air, and saw before him Salome's outstretched hand, with the allotted portion of bread and butter ready for his acceptance. She trembled as she watched him.

"Orlando!" she said softly, as their eyes met, "you here?"

"You do know me, do you? I thought you meant to give me the cold shoulder; and if you had I should have accepted it. My pride is not quite all gone. I am still as haughty as—as Lucifer."

She did not answer him, save by an expressive gesture that seemed to question his words.

"Come into Miss Calvert's room. I know she will allow me to ask you there," said Salome.

"Let me have breakfast first," he said bitterly; "this food looks good to a man who has not tasted any for twenty-four hours, and I smell a very good brew of coffee. Go on with your work, Salome—I'll not detain you—and after breakfast I'll have a few words with you, if you like."

"Of course you should have breakfast, and have it more comfortably," whispered Salome, her face flushing at his careless tone.

"This will do very well for me. Did I not say my pride was gone?"

"Did you not say you were still proud?" she asked.

He did not appear to notice her interruption, but proceeded,

"If your husband is a casual, my dear, you had better make the best of it, and treat him as such."

These words were whispered very softly, but they seemed to enter her ears like sharp needles and pierce them as acutely; yet Salome went on with her work as her husband had bade her, acting all the while as if in a dream, only able to see one truth clearly—that she must, if possible, save this poor wreck of humanity from drifting into the black harbor of eternal death—that she must draw him toward truth by cords of love, and bring him to rest at last upon Christ, the only sure Anchor of every sin-tossed, wandering, wayward human soul.

When the breakfast was fairly in progress, and Salome could find leisure for a few words to Miss Calvert, she requested that lady to come with her to her private room.

"Miss Calvert," she began, "I have a personal secret to tell you. Will you forgive me that I have hitherto deceived you? Believe me, that at first I did not see any harm in doing so, and lately, though I have been uneasy about it and was trying to gain courage to reveal all, as, Mr. Anerley advised, everything was already so much settled, and seemed to have been made so much easier for me than, if I now stated the whole truth, could possibly be the case, that I found it very hard indeed to disclose my real circumstances."

Miss Calvert's gentle face and sympathizing manner invited further confidence, and it came abruptly. Salome tried and tried again to find a preface for her facts, but could not.

"I am married, Miss Calvert," she said; "and my husband is at this moment in the hall."

"In the hall! My dear child—my poor girl—what you must have suffered! He is a bad man, then, I fear, and you have had to leave him? Pause, rest a few minutes, my dear Salome. Don't look like that; try to be brave, as you have been hitherto. Lay your head upon my shoulder."

Salome struggled hard against the dreadful faintness that stole over her, but for a little while her effort was of no use. Miss Calvert laid her on the small couch on which they had been seated together, and going to the door her room, sent for Cecil Anerley. He came once, and she admitted him.

"Salome Stanley has implied that you kn her history," she began.

But now Salome, by the aid of water smelling salts, had somewhat revived, turned her pale face, so pathetic in its sadn toward him and smiled feebly but reassurin Cecil, naturally overcome, said gently,

"Yes, Miss Calvert."

"The husband who has disgraced himself the hall, she tells me."

"Then it was he!" said Cecil aloud.

Cecil could not account for the vivid suspic he had had that the stranger was Salome St ley's husband. Perhaps it was really not wonderful he should have imagined this, as had watched, and been almost equally suspici of, several similar-looking men during that ter since he had learned her history. But w he observed further that this man spoke f few minutes with Salome as she dealt out provisions, and that though she had turned fr him calmly it was with a very sad pale face deed, it was quite natural he should have especially anxious about her, and eager to kn more.

"I must see him," said Salome at "Mr. Anerley, am I trespassing too much on y goodness to ask you to bring him here?"

She felt, as she spoke, that she was putt the nobility of his personal affection for he the very hardest test, but its grand unselfish made him able to bear it.

"I will bring him," he replied, "and grant that some good may come to you of this suffering!"

Cecil returned to the Hall, and whispere the ear of the stranger,

"Your wife wishes to see you; will you low me?"

The heavy eyes of Orlando Stanley looke at him in some surprise, but without a word rose in obedience to his summons. Cecil not need to look twice at him as he walked very sure that he was both weak and ill. Ph cally, morally, spiritually he was that ter spectacle of fallen humanity—a man bro down by his own sinful acts, a sight one w think, were it happily less common, sufficien deter any young man in the glory of his n hood from commencing a career so fraught horror and spoliation to himself and others.

Having shown him into the little room. seen him take the chair which Miss Calvert kindly set for him near to Salome, Cecil w drew, to take part in the short religious ser about to be commenced in the Hall for t who had attended the breakfast and any ot who might like to come in from the neigh hood.

Miss Calvert was also about to withdraw, Salome looked at her so appealingly that she constrained to remain. The first few min were passed in a very awkward silence. T Orlando Stanley, as if impatient of this, b it with the words—

"Well, Salome, have you invited me Quakers' meeting? Since you acknowledge as your husband, surely you have somethin say to me as a wife? If I could have gue that you were in such a good frame of m and so likely to be generous to a poor, har fellow, I should not so long have left you in disturbed possession of your neat little inco

"Orlando," returned Salome, beginning speak at last with a good deal of effort, bu the quiet, determined way that was natura her, "I see you are ill and unhappy, and I really to help you."

"You are right, Salome, as to health, an defy any man or woman to feel particul happy when they are suffering physical pain am perfectly willing, my dear, that you sh be of use to me, and perhaps both this lady yourself will excuse me if I say frankly how can best be done.

A PERPETUAL JUBILEE.

A Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Punshon, LL.D.

> "The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; He hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound."
> —ISAIAH 61 : 1.

Preparation for the Jubilee—A Significant Type of Christ's Redemption—I. Rest from Labor—The Saviour's Invitation to Earthly and Heavenly Rest—II. Restoration of Alienated Property—The Power of Old Associations—Our Lost Inheritance Regained, and Heaven in Addition—III. Restoration of Freedom—The Value of Liberty—Boasting Bondsmen—The Trumpet Blast of Deliverance.

THE allusion in the words just mentioned is, as you will understand, to the Jewish year of jubilee. The evangelical sense of the term, as it is to be here understood, is confirmed by the fact that when the Saviour preached in the synagogue this was His text, and He announced the fulfilment of the prophecy from the advent of the dispensation of the Gospel. The great purpose of the Redeemer, after He had accomplished the atonement by His voluntary death upon the cross, was to provide for the perpetual proclamation of this acceptable year of the Lord.

For this He called and commissioned the primitive apostles, and has raised up His ministers in bright and ever-enduring succession through all the ages of time. He only can properly announce Himself as the messenger from whose incarnation all these blessings are to flow. The original power of proclamation belonged of right to Him who had wrought out the redemption; but He has delegated it to men of like passions with ourselves, and the purpose to which their lives is to be incessantly devoted is to preach the Gospel—glad tidings to the sorrowful, healing and health to the spirits that are sore broken, liberty to sin's sad bondsmen, and to proclaim in the hearing of an enslaved and impoverished world the acceptable year of the Lord.

In the first place, if you study the history of the Jewish jubilee you find that

IT COMMENCED AT THE CLOSE OF THE DAY OF ATONEMENT.

Of the solemnities of that remarkable day you are, doubtless, aware, and that it was a public and a national confession and purgation of sin. Throughout the whole of the day there was one continued succession of expiations. Early in the morning the high priest presented at the door of the Tabernacle a bullock, in typical atonement for himself and his house. That bullock was slain, and its blood sprinkled upon the altar, the mercy-seat veiled the meanwhile by the cloud of incense from the worshippers' view. Then two goats were brought, and lots cast upon them which of them should be banished as the scape-goat into the wilderness. The one that was doomed for sacrifice was then solemnly slain, and its blood sprinkled in like manner upon the altar. The priest then confessed, upon the head of the goat which had been reserved for exile, the transgressions of the people, and it was afterward led off into the wilderness with all this typical guilt upon its head.

All this while the congregation fasted, for it was a day of prostration and of sorrow. The high priest dare not wear the ordinary garments of his office. Girt in simple linen clothes he had ministered, and now with reverent hands, in humble attire, with contrite soul, he lifts the veil and carries the token of the propitiation into the inner shrine. There the Divine presence shines in visible symbol; there God communes with His servants from off the mercy-seat and from between the cherubim; and, casting off his garments of contrition, and arraying himself in splendid robes, he comes forth with the glory yet lingerng on his brow, and with his breastplate glittering with the consecrated symbol of the tribes, and with uplifted hands communicates pardon, and dispenses blessing, and each one of the vast and prostrate multitude rises up gladdened and forgiven.

Now, brethren, is not this a type—a very true type—of the way in which spiritual blessings are exclusively introduced to mankind. There can be no jubilee for us—a race of lost and guilty rebels taken in arms, traitors convicted of treason—unless an all-prevalent atonement had previously purchased our pardon. A criminal does not rejoice, you know, in the interval between the sentence and its execution. He is ordinarily too much occupied with fell remorse for the past, and with dreamy horror of the future. It is not seemly for a child to be frivolous when there is brought home to him the conviction of his base ingratitude, and when displeasure struggles with affection upon the brow of the father. The heart of the convicted criminal and of the erring child should be filled with very different feelings.

Brethren, we are the criminals; each one of us has offended against the law, and has exposed himself to its judicial procedure. We are "condemned already." The sentence of death is in ourselves. Brethren, we are erring children; our Father has been rich in His provision, and bountiful in the memorials of His tenderness, but we have rebelled against His authority. We have grieved the very heart within Him, and we have exposed ourselves to the threat of disinheritance and perpetual exile from our ancestral home.

THERE CAN BE NO JUBILEE FOR US

until the law relaxes its grip upon us, and until the Father looks and smiles upon His repentant child. Before the bar of justice which has arraigned us we must cry, "Guilty, guilty before God." At the feet of the kindness we have outraged we must fling ourselves and say, groaning out with the prodigal, "Father, I have sinned." But, having done that, we need not lure the goat from the cliff, nor draw the bullock from the field, that we may offer it in sacrifice. Thank God, the blood of these meaner victims need not flow, for a costlier sacrifice has been offered for all time. It avails for the most wayward child, it avails for the most reprobate criminal, and our hearts, overflowing with a peace which they never knew before, may revel and may banquet in its glad tidings of great joy.

And this atonement which has brought gladness to one is intended to bring gladness to all; it is the exclusive source of safety and of happiness for man. Apart from its reconciling provisions there is a curse upon humanity which no sorcery of the world's wizardry can charm away. And all complacency which men may feel, and all good of which they imagine themselves possessed, are but

DELUSIVE AS THE MIDNIGHT DREAM.

There can be no peace, or if there be, it is a peace which God hath not spoken, like the treacherous calm just outside the eddy of the maelstrom, which only speeds the doomed vessel into the cruel eddy of its waves. There can be no hope, or if there be, it will have no freedom from the blush of shame, and no steadfast anchorage by which to hold. There can be no joy, or if there be, it will be a baseless and fugitive emotion, transient as the dew, but not like the dew, melting into the light of heaven. Peace and hope and joy for renovated man can come in happy jubilee only from the atonement of Christ.

I. Preserving the order in which in the history the blessings of the jubilee are brought before us, the first thing that strikes us is that there was

REST FROM EXHAUSTING LABOR.

By a providential arrangement, similar to that which secured a double supply of manna on the sixth day, the land had unusual fertility in the sixth year, so that in the seventh, which was the ordinary, and in the fiftieth, which was the special Sabbatical year, there was a suspension of the common duties of husbandry. Both the land and laborers had rest, and yet the supply did not fail, for there was plenty in every barn, and there was gladness in every heart.

Profane history confirms what scoffing unbelief might otherwise have regarded as a tale, for we are told by Josephus—an impartial historian' certainly—that in the time of Alexander the Great there was special exemption from taxes during the Sabbatical year, and that after the return from captivity the Sabbatical year was reverently and constantly maintained. And in a spiritual sense, brethren, is not just what our spirits so fervently require—just what the Gospel has been itself inspired to provide? The Saviour's most gracious invitation, addressed to a world of the heavy-laden, contains a promise of rest.

Oh! ye who have toiled so long, and who have reaped nothing from your profitless labor, take the yoke upon you, and you shall find rest unto your souls—rest of all kinds, rest for the vexed mind; for the bewilderments of its unbelief shall be disentangled, and it shall rejoice in settled principles which no doubts disturb, and in the confiding faith which can wait for the unveiling of mystery till the light of eternity has made luminous the darkness of time. Rest for the awakening conscience; for its remorseful memory shall be still, and its accusing voice silent, and the brand of its condemnation removed; and there shall come a great calm upon it, as when the lone lake sleeps beneath the hush of summer. Rest for the wayward heart; for it shall be weaned from its idols, and all its wanderings shall be forgiven, and it shall cleave to Jesus, and flutter into His bosom like the nestling bird, serene in the possession of an object upon which it can pour out its wealth of love.

Rest in acts of labor; for labor is in itself a blessing, and a free heart within the man will divest it of drudgery and weariness, and all the activities of the spiritual nature will go about doing good. Rest in the endurance of trial; for there shall be breathed a spirit of chastened resignation that will charm the anguish out of pain, and that will relax the frown from sorrow, and that in humble imitation of the great pattern will bless a scoffing world from beneath its crowning thorns. Rest in the mortal struggle; for the enemy shall be beaten from the field, and there shall be sunset splendors in the western sky, and the departing soul shall glow in that strange light of eventide, and shall leave all the sore travail of its doubt and mystery behind it, and shall enter upon quietness and assurance forever. And then rest at last, the perfecting of rest, "the rest that remaineth." Tears shed over the corpse, wailing at the solemn funeral, nights of weeping, for the living; but for the dead, angelic welcome and divine recognitions, and a coronation, and a home, and voices from heaven assuring the listening earth that they are blessed and God the Holy Ghost indorsing it with Divinest utterance—"Even so, saith the Spirit, for they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

Here are the blessings of the spiritual jubilee, and, brethren, these privileges are brought nigh, and are offered as your own in this acceptable year of the Lord. Rest in weariness now; rest from weariness forever. Now the glad travel of the pilgrim; then the sure abiding in the palace, and the eternal parting from the staff and sandals. Now the warrior's stern fight and brave conquest; then the loosing of the helmet and the sheathing of the useless sword. Now the wearied voyaging of the Christian mariner, then the calm water of the shallows, and the entrance into the fair haven forever. Oh! priceless inheritance, offered without price! Oh! gift of unfailing grace and love! Brethren, those of you that are in Jesus, realize the fulness of this earliest blessing of your jubilee, and let no one rob you of the rest that is rightly yours. Brethren, those of you that are yet weary and helpless strangers, Jesus waits to be gracious; the trumpet is sounded; the rest is offered you to-day.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Celebrated Chinese Letter which Caused so exciting an agitation just before the Presidential election has been the subject of investigation in the law courts and the journalist charged with forging it was on Saturday committed for trial. The letter purported to have been written by General Garfield, and its publication was calculated to seriously injure his prospects. Mechanics learned from it with amazement that the Republican candidate for the Presidency was not opposed to the wholesale importation of Chinamen to work in our factories, and even approved of the scheme in the interest of employers. General Garfield denied having written such a letter, and evidence was produced to prove that the whole production, even to the post-marks on the envelope, was a forgery. The letter was addressed to H. L. Morey, of Lynn, Mass., but it was stated that no such person had ever lived there, and the question of his identity became an important element in the inquiry. Witnesses were however, produced to prove the existence of Morey, but subsequently the two men who gave the evidence confessed that they had been paid to swear falsely. Thus the plot from beginning to end appears to have been a disgraceful attempt to influence the votes of American citizens by a fraudulent issue.

Patriotic citizens of all parties unite in denouncing the crime. The unscrupulous persons who planned and executed it cared not, providing General Garfield's prospects were injured, who else suffered. The party they designed to serve lies under imputation, and the national honor is degraded in the eyes of the world by their wicked act. For the sake of public morality it may be hoped they will be punished as a warning to others. It is gratifying to observe that Mr. Barnum has published a statement on behalf of the National Democratic Committee emphatically repudiating all responsibility in the matter. He states distinctly that the committee did not see the letter until after it had been published. That assurance is very welcome, for it would have been a matter for general humiliation had the leaders of a great party stooped to a scheme so infamous as this of forgery and perjury.

A Fatal Colliery Disaster Occurred at Stellarton, N.S., on Friday, November 12th, in the Foord Pit, Albion Coal Mines. These are the same mines in which the great fire of 1861 broke out, but the Foord Pit had until last Friday been free from these distressing calamities. The first intimation of the catastrophe was a terrific explosion which startled the neighborhood at half past six o'clock A.M. Investigation showed that gas had collected in one of the bonds or headers of the pit, and had been ignited by a defective lamp. A full force of men—about one hundred and sixty—were in the pit at the time, and only a portion of them escaped. Several efforts were made by volunteer parties to explore the pit, but the presence of fire damp was so perceptible that it was considered a useless risk of life to proceed far from the mouth of the shaft. On Saturday another attempt was made, and several dead bodies were found, but on proceeding about a mile into the workings it was discovered that the pit was on fire, and on returning to the surface with that report it was decided, in order to prevent further disaster, to flood the pit. That course destroys all hope of rescuing any of the entombed miners, but the existence of fire in the part in which they are known to have been at work convinces the engineers that they must have been killed almost instantaneously. The men known to be missing number thirty-five, and it is feared that there may be others in the pit about whom no inquiry has been made.

One of the most Gratifying Results of the Recent election was the vote in Kansas, by which the Constitutional Amendment was carried by a majority of 10,000. The Amendment puts an end to the manufacture, importation, and sale of alcoholic liquors except for medicinal and manufacturing purposes. The citizens will find the benefit of the new regulation, if it be loyally carried out, in increased prosperity and in a conspicuous reduction of State expenses for prisons, hospitals, and poor-houses.

Two More Financial Disasters have Befallen Hackensack, N. J. It is but a short time since the National Bank and the Savings Institutions of Hackensack collapsed, and now a defaulting treasurer has ruined the Bank of Bergen County and the Bergen County Savings Bank. The defalcations are variously estimated. The lowest figure mentioned by those who are acquainted with the affairs of the banks is $120,000, and one of the directors of the Bank of Bergen County asserts that the amount taken will reach $200,000. The directors of both banks considered that the interests of creditors would be consulted by closing the institutions as soon as the deficiency was discovered, lest in the run that would ensue some might profit at the expense of others. The treasurer, who is respectably connected, has been arrested, and he promptly surrendered his personal property to reduce the loss. It is believed that he lost money heavily by speculation in Wall Street, and also in importing expensive fancy breeds of fowls, for some of which he paid $100 each, and abstracted the securities of the banks to cover his losses.

A Mutiny in Utah has Been Put Down with some rigor. A number of young ladies belonging to the Mormon body formed a society in which the members pledged themselves not to marry any man who would not promise to be content with one wife, and not to marry any man who was already married. As this society struck at the root of the Mormon principles, it was ruthlessly dissolved. Five grand-daughters of Brigham Young were among the members. The cruelty practised in Utah is sending up a cry to heaven for vengeance, and unless prompt and energetic measures to enforce the law of God are taken by the Washington government, it will incur its share of the responsibility.

Another Ladies' Swindling Enterprise has collapsed. This time the headquarters were in New York. Several months ago Mrs. Warren and Mrs. McIntire rented rooms in Union Square, and furnished them in elegant style. Stock indicators and telephones connecting with the offices of stock brokers were obtained, and patronage was solicited by extensive advertising. Mrs. McIntire retired from the partnership about three months ago, and Mrs. Warren continued the business. She represented that she had a large sum of money at her command and an extended experience with the intricacies of stock speculation, and many women invested hundreds, and in some instances thousands of dollars. Mrs. Warren's manner of doing business was to receive a sum of money for a certain number of days, with the understanding that she could invest it or not, according as her judgment dictated, and if an investment was made she would return half of the profit of the investment. The principal was in any event to be returned to the person making the investment. Mrs. Warren has suddenly left the city, and her numerous victims can find no traces of her or their lost money.

A Man was Rescued from a Living Grave on Friday, November 5th, where he had been since the previous Wednesday. He had undertaken, in company with another man, to clean out the bottom of an old well at Smithtown, L. I. As he descended by a rope the wall of the well gave way and buried him. His companion procured assistance to dig out the dead body, but after digging for an hour or two the voice of the man supposed to be dead was heard entreating him to hurry in rescuing him. The work was attended with danger, for it was found that in excavating, the loose sand fell, blocking up the arch which protected the entombed man. As it seemed probable that the arch would fall upon him if the fallen sand were disturbed further, it was decided to sink another well by the side of the old one and tunnel from one to the other. The man was immured for thirty-nine hours before he was finally delivered. The sinner's position is just as desperate without Christ. There would have been no hope of deliverance had not the Saviour come down to earth to seek and to save that which was lost (Isa. 63 : 5).

Active Preparations are in Progress in San Francisco to secure the success of the services to be held in that city by Moody and Sankey. At a recent meeting of the Ministerial Union the best and most effective means of preparing the people for the approaching visit were discussed. It was resolved that the various pastors hold prayer-meetings in their respective churches to entreat God's blessing on the services. It was also suggested that Mr. Schluembach, an earnest preacher who is at present in Chicago, be invited to visit San Francisco during the stay of the evangelists to prosecute special work among the atheistic Germans. On their way to San Francisco the evangelists made a short stay at Salt Lake City, and held services there which were crowded with attentive listeners.

Colonel Drake, who Sank the First Oil Well in Pennsylvania, died at New Bethlehem, Pa., on November 8th. In 1858 Drake was a conductor on the New York & New Haven Railroad, but he left his appointment to arrange some business at Titusville for a firm in New Haven. While engaged at Titusville he examined the soil and the springs, and became convinced that oil might be obtained by boring. The idea was ridiculed, but Drake obtained the services of an old salt borer and sank his well. The result was a large supply of oil, and he realized a large fortune. Subsequent speculations, however, proved disastrous, and he became so poor that in 1873 he was glad to accept a pension of $1500 a year from the State, on which he has subsisted since then. To-day the oil region is honeycombed with wells; the supply of petroleum far exceeds the demand. A statue to Colonel Drake's memory is to be erected on the new Oil Exchange now being built in Titusville.

Bible and Prayer Union.—The Lessons for the ensuing week are the consecutive Psalms, that for to-morrow, Friday, being Psalm 109. The following requests for prayer have been received: From the pastor of a prosperous, happy, and useful church, now threatened with dissention, that unity and peace may continue, and that a present and pressing crisis may result in solidifying instead of agitating the church.—From an anxious mother that the life of a beloved child now seriously ill may be spared if consistent with the will of God, and that whether the issue be of life or death, His Holy Spirit may be given her leading her to the Saviour.

The Disasters on Lake Michigan, among which the Alpena was conspicuous, have aroused the authorities to practical action to prevent a recurrence of similar calamities. Orders have been issued by the Signal Service Department for the erection of additional signals throughout the chain of lakes, and especially upon Lake Michigan, in order that shipmasters may have prompt warning of the approach of dangerous winds, and of the direction from which they are likely to come. These signals will be very valuable, and doubtless they will be carefully watched by the captains of the vessels on the lakes. It would be a good thing if the warnings of the Bible in spiritual matters received as careful attention. The critical time which prophecy indicates as being close at hand will come upon many Christians unprepared (Mark 13 : 37).

Sixty Years Ago a Person Deposited in a savings bank in New York, through Mr. Anson G. Phelps, the sum of twenty dollars for the benefit of Christian missions in Syria. During the present year Mr. William E. Dodge, in looking over the contents of an old trunk, came upon the bank-book vouching for the deposit. He took it to the bank, and the officers admitted the genuineness of the book, but said that all the men connected with the bank at the time of the deposit were deceased. However there was an old gentleman in the bank, familiar with the past books, who looked up the account, which had been regularly posted year by year, and found that with the accumulated interest it amounted to one hundred and seventy dollars. "I thought," he said, "that Jerusalem book would some day turn up." There surely was never a more striking illustration of the text, "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days" (Eccles. 11 : 1).

An Observatory Under Ground is a Novel experiment in science now being made by Professor Watson of the Wisconsin State University at Madison, Wis. It is generally known that from the bottom of a deep well the stars can be very plainly seen at bright noonday. Upon this principle Professor Watson is conducting his experiment. A cellar twenty feet in depth has been sunk below the surface of the ground at the bottom of the slope; over that a fine stone building erected. At the top of the hill, which is sixty feet above the bottom of the cellar, powerful reflectors are to be placed, to throw rays of light down a large tube which ends in the cellar, where the observer will be stationed. This is a scientific experiment based on a known fact; the same fact suggested to an eloquent preacher a spiritual lesson. He reminded his hearers that Christians sunk in the depths of adversity often saw stars of God's love shining which were invisible to those in the noonday of prosperity.

It is a Significant Sign of the Times that, notwithstanding the recent execution of murderers in New York which attracted so much public attention, there are now in the Tombs prison sixteen homicides awaiting trial for crimes committed within the last few months, and several more are still at large despite the efforts of the detectives. Some of these crimes were peculiarly atrocious, and drink and jealousy are their most prominent characteristics. It is a long time since the prison has been so full. Those philosophers who hope that education and civilization will eventually reform the world must in the face of such a fact begin to doubt the efficacy of either influence. But Christian laborers will see in it the pressing need of extending the work of the Gospel, and increased effort to shed abroad the spirit of love and the knowledge of the Saviour.

The Adventures of two Dime Novel Readers living at Louisville, Ky., though somewhat young, indicate the serious injury that kind of literature is effecting. The two boys decided to run away from home and commence a career of highway robbery. The first stage of their flight was to be by rail, but they had only money enough to buy one ticket. It was arranged that one boy should travel in the car, and the other, [illegible] Hitt, in a trunk. His companion, having locked and strapped the trunk, had it delivered at the depot and checked for Selma, Ala. He bought a ticket for himself and started by the same train. The boy in the trunk was furnished with a bottle of water and a supply of bread to subsist on during the trip, and a few holes had been cut in the trunk for the admission of air. Before the train started, the trunk containing Young Hitt was thrown upside down in the baggage-car together with a lot of other baggage. Young Hitt, however, began thinking of the danger he was undergoing, and soon forgot his dreams in his desire to be out of the box. The air began to stifle him, and the warm blood rushed to his head. At a point on the road some additional trunks were received, and piled up all around the boy's prison, completely shutting off his supply of air. This alarmed him, and he cried out loudly, frightening the baggage-master, who thought the train had been boarded by robbers. The lid was broken off, and young Hitt was revealed to the sight of the astonished baggage-master. The romance had been completely taken out of the boy, and he was glad to be sent home by the next train.

Some Fishermen were Terrified at a Mirage of a vivid description on November 1st in Watchapreague Inlet, off the County of Accomack, Virginia. There were about twenty fishing boats riding at anchor. The sun arose behind a thick fog bank. All the crews were busy at their lines when a shout from one of the boats was heard. The other crews looked up, and apparently not a quarter of a mile away lay the island of Chincoteague, with its tall white tower, its dwellings, its trees and shrubbery, and a little boy driving a flock of sheep along the shore, and even a little girl sitting in the door of the lightkeeper's house with a doll in her arms. In another minute another fog bank rose up between them and the shore, shutting out from their vision their own homes. The spectacle so appalled the men that they broke anchorage in the greatest consternation, many of them in their fright steering directly out to sea. An hour afterward the mist vanished, and the sun shone out. The mirage had disappeared, but the men were too much alarmed to continue their work. The fright of the men at the strange sight reminds us of the terror that will seize upon the wicked when Christ appears in the clouds at His second coming (Rev. 6 : 16).

A Five Days' Journey through Four Miles of snow was the experience of a party of miners who were snow-bound on Needle Mountain, Col. The drifts were high around their hut on every side, and it became evident that, as their stock of provisions was small, they must quickly dig their way out or starve to death. One was too ill to stir, and the rest cast lots to determine which should stay with him. Food and fuel enough for a week was left with the two men, and the others started on their desperate journey through the snow. The distance to the nearest settlement was only four miles, but they were five days on the journey, and their sufferings were intense, both from cold and hunger. Provisions and assistance were promptly dispatched to their companions left behind.

Indian Truthfulness.—Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, lecturing in Boston recently, said he had never found an instance in which the plighted word of an Indian had been broken, but that the Indian term for white men was synonymous with "liar." It is a sad and shameful fact that the red man's experience in dealing with those who boast of superior civilization tends to confirm him in his estimate of the white men.

A Crusade against Liquor Sellers in Washington, D. C., is being prosecuted by Postmaster-General Maynard. On the opposite side of the street in which the Department building is located, several liquor dealers do a thriving business. According to the city regulations, any person opening a saloon ought to furnish a petition indorsed by a majority of the inhabitants of the street in which it is to be opened. The Postmaster-General found that the law was being evaded by his neighbors, and is prosecuting them for selling liquor without legal license.

DESIRES TOWARD GOD: A SERMON FOR THE WEAK.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Lord, all my desire is before thee; and my groaning is not hid from thee."—Psalm 38 : 9.

The Duty of Caring for the Weak in Christ—Strong Men Sometimes become Weak—I. Desires toward God should be made known to Him—1. Because Life ought to be Transparent before God—2. Because He Commands it—3. It Benefits the Soul—4. It Proves if the Desire is Right—II. Desires toward God are Gracious Things—Associated with other Graces—They come from God—Are a Test of Character—A Better Test than Boasts of Holiness—They have been Prominent in the Best Men—An African King—III. God Carefully observes Desires toward Him—IV. They will be Fulfilled—They are of His Creation—A Blessing Possessed Already—God Loves to Gratify Right Desires—The Joy of Praise.

It is our earnest desire that all who are in Christ may be strong in the Lord and in the power of His might. I could earnestly wish to see such spiritual life among us that every man had reached the very height of holy manhood, and was in possession of the utmost possible degree of spiritual vigor. It is a great calamity when there is a very large proportion of sick folk in any Christian community, for these must draw off the care and strength of the church from aggressive movements. How favored should we be if it could be said of us as of Israel when they came out of Egypt, "There was not one feeble person in all their tribes." Oh! that the day would come when the word shall be fulfilled which saith, "He that is feeble among them shall be as David; and the house of David shall be as God, as the angel of the Lord before them."

Let no man suppose that there is a necessity that he should always be weak in faith, always walk under a cloud, or that he should forever be a Mr. Feeble-mind or Mr. Ready-to-Halt. Miracles of grace are for saints as well as sinners; feeble minds can be strengthened and crutches thrown away. We ought to grow out of the feebleness of our spiritual childhood. We should cry to God for grace that we may get up "into the hill country" of holy confidence, and there, like Mary, sing, "My soul doth magnify the Lord."

At the same time we are most painfully conscious that all God's people are not in a vigorous condition, and we know that there is a large mixture in every church of those who are sickly, desponding, and faint. These we are bound to care for; common humanity demands it, our sacred office binds us to it, and the example of the good Shepherd constrains us. We must feed the lambs. We must "lift up the hands that hang down, and confirm the feeble knees." The voice of God is heard in our hearts saying, "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people," which voice we dare not disregard; indeed, the sympathies aroused within us by a similar experience prompt us to be forward in compassionating the weak and the tried.

We would not pamper weakness till we seem to offer a premium to unbelief; but yet we would feed the feeble in the king's meadows till they become strong in the Lord. I shall now look after those who cannot get beyond desires and groans, and let none blame me for this service. If the shepherd spends much of his time among the weakly sheep, if he gathers the lambs with his arm and carries them in his bosom, if he seems even to neglect the stronger sheep because they do not so urgently call for his care, no one will hence infer that he delights in feebleness. Far from it; he is trying to remove it by his tenderness.

You do not blame the humane for caring for the sick. If great efforts are put forth to build or endow a hospital, you do not say, "Sickness is a desirable thing, for all this money is spent upon comforting and helping those who feel it." Your feelings are quite the contrary: though these sick folk become the object of care, it is not as a reward to them, but as an act of compassion toward them. Let none, therefore, say that the preacher encourages a low state of grace: he encourages it no more than the physician encourages disease when he tries by his care and skill to heal the sick.

Truth to tell, I have known the strong men come into such a condition at times that the milk for babes was all that they could take. Burly Samsons who can carry Gaza's gates may yet be so reduced that they can digest nothing but milk diet. Those whose confidence is at its very height to-day may be brought so low that they will prize beyond gold the smallest marks and evidences of grace, and will be delighted to take hold upon those elementary truths which belong to new-born believers. Even fathers in Christ are glad at times to seize upon those simple promises which aforetime they left to the most trembling of the saints, or perhaps to desponding sinners.

If, therefore, at this present I speak to the very lowest form of Christian life, if I try to meet the weakest case, I shall not admit that I am neglecting the strong. My giant brother over yonder can have a drink of milk if he likes; it will not hurt him. Come and try it, my worthy friend. Receive again the simple doctrine by which little children live, and you will find wholesome fare.

I. Our first point is

DESIRES TOWARD GOD SHOULD BE MADE KNOWN TO HIM.

You, it may be, my dear friend, cannot see any grace in yourself at all; all that you do perceive is a desire to have grace. You know that you desire to repent of sin, desire to be delivered from it, desire to be made a new creature in Christ Jesus, desire to be perfectly reconciled to God, but you fear that you have come no further. Now, it is true that many desires are of no avail whatever. "The sluggard desireth, and hath nothing." Mere wishes are sorry things. But the desires of our text are earnest desires, the movements of the heart, for they are accompanied by "groaning." The psalm evidently speaks of desires after God, not after temporal things; desires which are mainly expressed in the first verse of the psalm: "O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath: neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure." It is of intense, earnest, agonizing desires toward God for spiritual things that I am about to speak. Such desires ought to be made known unto God.

It may be said that God knows our desires, and that this is what the text itself asserts. I do not doubt the omniscience of God; but he bids us confess everything to Him quite as carefully as if He did not know it until we informed Him. We are to tell out our cases for ourselves just as David did, for it was not until after he had told out his sad story in the eight previous verses that He said, "All my desire is before thee." We may expect the Lord to treat us as if he did not know our desires if we are negligent in declaring them.

1. Make known, then, your requests; and do so, first, because our whole life ought to be transparent before God. What is the use of endeavoring to hide anything? "All things are naked and open to the eyes of Him with whom we have to do." The life of every man should be unveiled before the eye of heaven; but as to those who are believers in Christ, even in the humblest degree, they desire no concealment; rather do they cry, "Search me, O God." We do not wish to hide anything; our hope lies in our heavenly Father's knowing all. There should be no wish to smuggle up even a stray desire, or to conceal the most doleful groan; all should be open and above-board between a sinner and his Saviour.

2. Do this next, because it is commanded of God that we should make our desires known to Him. Prayer, which is a constant duty and privilege, is practically "desire." It is desire with its garments on; desire booted and saddled for travelling the heavenly road. Prayer without desire is dead; its soul has fled, it is but the carcass of prayer. When desire is burning in the soul it sends up the flame of prayer, or the sparks of sighs and groans. Prayer is the fiery chariot, and desires are its horses of fire.

3. It is a great benefit to a man to be able to express his desires, and this is an argument for making them known to God. You know your own desires better by trying to express them; they are indistinct till prayer sketches their likeness and fixes their image. Even should you fail to express your desires, their inexpressible character will better make known to you their greatness and their intensity. Sometimes a desire that is in the heart would at once be extinguished if you were to attempt to express it, for you would not dare to allow it to exist after you once saw its true nature. A glance at some desires would seal their doom, for we should feel them to be unworthy to be presented before the Lord. But when it is a holy and pure desire, tell it, for it will relieve your heart, it will heighten your estimate of the blessing sought, it will bring you to think over the promises made to such desires, it will thereby strengthen your hope that your desire will be fulfilled, and enable you by faith to obtain it.

Perhaps you feel that you cannot pray because you are under so dense a gloom; but then is the time to double your desires and your pleadings. I am told that the flower, of which the ancients used to say so much, because it always turns toward the sun, is said to follow the great Lord of day just as much in cloudy weather as when his bright beams gladden all things. What though the sun is not visible, yet he is still in his sphere, and the nature of the flower seems to tell it in what direction to turn. Be it ever so with our soul in gloomy hours.

4. A gracious expression of desire before God will often be to you a proof that those desires are right. A desire that you dare tell to God is sure to be of a godly sort. If I can say, "Oh, Lord, all my desire is before Thee, and I wish it to be before Thee: I court Thine inspection because I hope Thou wilt fulfil the desire," then my wish is such as conscience approves, and is right and good. Is there not comfort in this for those of you who think you have nothing more than desires. If you have desires which you wish the Lord to know of they must be right; you would not dare to bring them before God if they were not good desires?

II. This leads up to my second head, which is this: desires toward God are

GRACIOUS THINGS.

Intense groaning desires toward God are in themselves works of grace.

For certainly, first, they are associated with other graces. When a man can say, "All my desire is toward God, and my heart groans after Him, and yet I find little in myself but these desires," I think we can point him to some other good things which are in his heart. Surely humility is apparent enough. Thou takest a right view of thyself, Oh, man of desires. A lowly esteem hast thou of thyself, and this is well. I would to God that some who are full of brags and boasts about their holiness could only be as safe as thou art with thy desires and groans, for there is in thee that broken and contrite heart which the Lord will not despise. God hath given thee this jewel among the rest—a meek and lowly spirit.

Ay, and there is faith in thee, for no man heartily desires to believe unless he doth in some measure already believe. There is a measure of believing in every true desire after believing. If thou sayest, "I would trust Christ," why, soul, thou trustest Him already in some degree, since thou dost believe that He is the kind of person whom it would be right to trust. Thy desire to cast thyself wholly upon Christ hath in it the beginnings of saving faith.

And thou hast love, too; I am sure of it. Did ever a man desire to love that which he did not love already? Thou hast already some affection toward the Lord Jesus, some drawings of thy heart Christward, or else thou wouldst not sigh and cry to be more filled with it. He who loves most is the very man who most passionately desires to love more. Love and desire keep pac in Christians, so that the more love the mor desire to love; and so I gather that this desir of thine to love Jesus is a sure evidence tha thou dost love Him already. Thy desire is th smoke which proves that there is fire in thy sou A living flame lingers yet among the embers, an with a little fanning it will reveal itself.

Thy desire to serve God is obedience, thy desir to pray is prayer, thy desire to praise is prais I am sure, also, that thou hast some hope; for man does not continue to groan out before h God, and to make his desire known, unless he h some hope that his desire will be satisfied, ar that his grief will be assuaged. David lets o the secret of his own hope, for he says in the f teenth verse, "In Thee, O Lord, do I hope You, my downcast brother, do not hope an where else, do you? You know that every oth door is shut, every other road is blocked up e cept that which leads from your soul to God. know you have some hope, and therefore if y have no hope anywhere else I am persuaded th you have a hope in God.

Another proof that they are gracious is th they come from God. Desires after God mu come from some source or other. If you desi to be holy, where did that desire come fro From your own corrupt nature? Impossib Certain believers in free-will may think so, but are not agreed with them. We believe that no can bring a clean thing out of an unclean, neith can thorns bring forth figs. If there is a desir and a groaning of the heart after God in yo bosom, depend upon it human nature never ori nated it. Can sin desire holiness, or death pant life? Holy desires are plants which are by means native to the soil of human nature; th seed comes from a far country.

Did the devil work these holy desires, thi you? Hearken, brother, does the devil ma you thirst after God? Does he make you si and cry after the light of your Father's coun nance? Does he make you pray to be delive from temptation? Does he make you sigh to conformed to the image of Christ? Then devil has very greatly altered since I met him l and since he was described in Holy Writ, or s in the conflicts of good men. Who, then, kindled these heavenly flames of desire?

I earnestly avow my belief that every p desire is as much the work of God as the gr which it desires. He who sincerely longs to right with God has already somewhat of a w of divine grace within his soul creating th aspirations. Now, as God can say of all that creates, "It is very good," I come to the c clusion that these groaning desires after God very good. They are not great, nor strong, they are gracious. There is water in a drop well as in the sea, there is life in a gnat as as in an elephant, there is light in a beam as as in the sun, and so is there grace in a desir truly as in complete sanctification.

Thirdly, holy desires are

A GREAT TEST OF CHARACTER.

A test of eminent value. You inquire, " you judge a man's character by his desire I answer, yes. I will give you the other sid the question that you may see our own side the more clearly. You may certainly judg bad man by his desires. Here is a man who sires to be a thief. Well, he is a thief in h and spirit. Who would trust him in his h now that he knows that he groans to rob steal? Here is a man who desires to be an a terer—is he not in God's sight already su Did not Jesus tell us so? Here is a man desires to be a Sabbath-breaker, but he is c pelled by his situation to attend the hous God; he is really in God's sight a Sabb breaker, because he would follow his own w on God's holy day if he had the opportu The desire to commit a fraud, and especially earnest desire to do it, would prove a man t a villain at heart. If a man were to say, want to cut my enemy's throat, I am full of venge, I am groaning to murder him," is he a murderer already before God?

Let us, then, measure out justice in our own case by the rule which we allow toward others. Let me help you to apply the principle. If you have a desire, an earnest, agonizing desire toward that which is right, even though through the infirmity of the flesh and the corruption of your nature you do not reach to the height of your desire, yet that desire is a test of your character. The main set of the current determines its direction: the main bent of the desire is the test of the life.

Note, further, that our desires are a test very much superior to several other favorite modes of self-judging. For instance, many people judge their religion by the regularity of their attention to its outward duties. "I was never absent on a Sunday morning, nor even from an evening service. I attend the communion at least once a month, I go to the prayer-meetings, I read a chapter or half a chapter every day, I bow my knees at my bedside every morning and evening: I have never omitted any part of my duty for years past." I am very glad to hear it, respected friend; but if you have no desires toward God all your regularity of attendance does but liken you to the church clock, which is quite as punctual, or to the pulpit Bible, which never leaves its place. You may be a capital Pharisee, but you are not a true Christian unless your soul is full of living desires.

Desires are

than self-congratulation about the possession of gracious things: I say not better than the possession of graces, but better than the supposed possession of them. Did you say, "I have faith, I can move mountains?" I had sooner hear you say, "Lord, increase our faith." Did you boast, "I have love, so that I shall never backslide or deny Christ?" I had rather thou shouldst say "Hold thou me up and I shall be safe." Do you say, "I have experience, and shall never be misled. I can hear heresy and be none the worse!" Ah, yes, I have heard that kind of talk, but I feel safer about a man who says, "Preserve me, O Lord, for in Thee do I put my trust."

Remember that the chief of the apostles said, 'Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do, forgetting those hings which are behind, and reaching forth unto hose things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." We feel surer as to the grace in man's heart who groans after more grace than we do of him who boasts, "I am rich and increased in goods and have need of nothing." A man may be full and dead; but he who hungers s alive.

Brother, if your soul is desiring and crying nd groaning after God, do not condemn yourelf because you cannot speak quite so positively s others as to your safety or your sanctity: dere on, and groan on; but at the same time get earer to the cross, trust more completely, look ut of self, and rest more fully in the covenant romises of God. Your state is not one to cause ouble; it is painful but it is not perilous.

I am sure that there is a graciousness about oly desires, because they have been very prominent the very best of men. Look at David! See ow his soul longs, yea, even faints! Hear how pants, like a hart for the water-brook, that he ay draw near to God! His Psalms are very rgely made up of desires; they abound with such ssages as "One thing have I desired of the ord, that will I seek after"; "Unto Thee, O ord, do I lift up my soul"; "My soul thirsteth r God." All his desires went heavenward, for said, "Whom have I in heaven but Thee?" d in his last hours he exclaimed concerning the venant of grace, "This is all my salvation and my desire."

Nor must we forget Daniel. In the passage in ich Daniel is spoken of as a "man greatly loved," which is a very sweet translation, the ords may be read, "a man of desires." There is remarkable expression: when the king had eamed and none could interpret the dream, "Then Daniel went to his house and made the thing known to Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, his companions, that they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret." In other books we should have found it stated that he asked his friends to pray, but Daniel went to the very soul of things, and begged them to desire. His prayers thrice a day were not formal; they were deeply and intensely sincere, and hence they were full of desire, which is the motive force, the life-blood of prayer. Daniel, then, was a man of great desires, and hence a desirable man with God; a man greatly beloved.

As for Nehemiah, that faithful servant of God, he began his work by praying for a blessing on those who "desired" to fear God's name. If you turn to the New Testament what a man of desires Paul was! he was always desiring this and desiring that for other people, until he desired for himself that he might depart and be with Christ. A part of the inheritance of Israel of old lay on this side Jordan, but the major portion was on the farther shore; and so the major part of a believer's portion for the present lieth in desires for things not yet attained.

A man of devotion is always a man of desires. Among your acquaintances you will find the best people are fullest of longings to be better. They know that God has blessed them, they rejoice in every particle of grace they have ever received from Him, but they are always wanting more. They are in spiritual things as hard to satisfy as the king whom Du Chaillu met with in the centre of Africa. He gave him a huge present of goods, and his gracious Majesty was overjoyed and held a great feast over the treasure; but before the week was over his black kingship said to Du Chaillu, "Truly, goods and money are like hunger; you are filled to-day, but to-morrow you are hungry again."

In one sense he who has obtained grace never hungers—that is to say, he needs nothing beyond his God; but in another sense he always hungers more and more the more he obtains. Covetousness of goods is a crime, but covetousness of good is a virtue. "Covet earnestly the best gifts." He who has little grace can be content with little, he that hath more grace longs for more, and he who hath most is insatiable to a still larger degree. He hath the greatest esteem for the heavenly treasure who hath had the most acquaintance with it, and, therefore, he longeth to possess all that can be possessed. Time warns me to leave this point, only repeating the fact that desires toward God are gracious things.

III. Thirdly,

DESIRES TOWARD GOD ARE CAREFULLY OBSERVED BY HIM.

Was not that the first head? No, it was not; the first head was that we ought to make our desires known to God; the third head is that they are known. It is wonderful condescension that the Lord should observe so poor a creature as a sinful, mournful mortal. You heard me read the whole Psalm just now; is it not a terrible description of a horrible sickness? I wonder how many of you would like to go and visit a man who was in the condition which David pictures, and watch over him, and nurse him? Here was a man who had no soundness in his flesh, and no rest in his bones, but was eaten up with a loathsome disease, and covered with wounds which corrupted till they stank.

The Lord cannot look upon iniquity, He hates and loathes it infinitely, and yet He looks upon His poor servant when sin has wrought in him all this mischief. Oh, poor, broken-down believer, thy God still looks upon thee! Oh, thou whose wounds gangrene, thou who seemest already to be rotting into the sepulchre of apostacy, still if there be any life and desire in thee, thy God is watching thee; with tender, loving eye He sees thee in thy misery and filthiness.

Oh, is it not a blessed matter of fact that my desire is before God? Even when I cannot speak it out it is all before Him. I cannot explain it, but it is known to Him. It puzzles me to put my case, but it will not puzzle Him to solve it, and to deal with it, and to deliver me out of the evil of it. "All my desire is before thee," as if he had just said, "There it is, Lord," I have not kept back anything. As far as I know I have put it all in thy view; but, inasmuch as I do not know it all, I cannot express it all, but this is still my comfort, that Thine eye misses no point, Thy heart leaves nothing unperceived; Thou knowest all about me, and Thou wilt deal wisely with me.

IV. The last head is that EARNEST DESIRE TOWARD GOD WILL BE FULFILLED.

How do we know this? If men are sighing and crying to God they will be heard—how know we that?

Why, first, because these desires are of God's creation, and you cannot imagine, at least I hope you cannot imagine, that God would create desires in us which He will not satisfy. Why, look even in nature; if He gives the beast hunger and thirst He provides for it the grass upon the mountains and the streams that flow among the valleys. There is not a fish in the sea nor an insect in the air but what God has made provision for gratifying its instincts and its desires. If, then, He Himself has put in you a desire after Himself He will give you Himself.

I have seen some treat children very unkindly when to make sport for themselves they have exhibited fruit or toys to the children which have excited great desire, and they have acted as if they were going to give them to the children, and then they have gone away and given them nothing, and laughed at them. They thought there was wit in such conduct, but it seemed to me meanness itself. God hath no such cruel ways with men; if He has taught them to desire grace He will fulfil their desire.

Remember, Oh, desiring man, that already you have a blessing. When our divine Master was on the mountain-side the benedictions which He pronounced were no word-blessings, but they were full of weight and meaning, and among the rest of them is this: "Blessed are they that do hunger and thirst after righteousness." Blessed while they hunger, blessed while they thirst. Yes, they are already blessed, and there is this at the back of it, "for they shall be filled." Thank God that you hunger.

And we may be sure, dear friends, that God will hear the desires which He has Himself created, because He loves to gratify right desires. Do you not know that God loves to give us pleasure! It is His joy to do it. It is one of the joys of the great Father's heart to make His children glad. Be assured, my dear friend, it is no joy to God to see you with that dreary countenance. God delights in the delight of His people; He has made a promise to the happy which well fits in with my text: Delight thyself also in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desires of thine heart." He would have us rejoice in Him, for He rejoices over us; if you need proof, note well the names He gives us: "Thou shalt be called Hephzibah, and thy land Beulah: for the Lord delighteth in thee." If God delights to fulfil our desires, let us not be slack in desiring.

What a joy it will be when you get your desire satisfied, and how you will praise the Lord! It may not be very long before your soul's longing is before you. This prophecy I venture to make concerning you, that when the Lord has given you the desire of your heart you will hardly know how to extol Him sufficiently. How you will bless and magnify His dear name! and what is more, others will begin to praise Him too.

As you spread your joy, and perfume the atmosphere with gladness, the saints will bless God that He has given you the desire of your heart. I am persuaded that you will obtain your desire, since it will glorify God for you to have it. "Whoso offereth praise glorifieth God," and you will praise Him and thus glorify Him. Go your way, and seek the Lord with confidence through Jesus Christ, and He will bless you evermore. Amen.

DECLINE AND FALL OF EDWARD WILSON.

A Temperance Story, by Mrs. Pitman.

EDWARD WILSON was a respected clergyman in the north of Scotland some twenty years since. After some years of single life he married a young lady in every way suitable to him, and it seemed as if the course of his life would run smoothly and honorably in the Master's cause. But events proved that a secret, unsuspected sin was, like a worm in the bud, killing all these fair anticipations, and laying up food for future woe.

This warning shadow of coming evil was a taste for wine. Mr. Wilson was accustomed to partake of wine as a stimulus for purposes of study and a quickener of the jaded system.

Mr. Wilson's young family had grown up about him, and he himself was getting on toward middle age, when it began to be whispered about that he liked his glass! It at last got to Mrs. Wilson's ears, and she, with all the horror-stricken eagerness of a wife, hastened to combat and contradict them. But her heart sunk within her as she remembered that she could not truthfully deny some of the assertions.

No lie cuts so deeply as that which has a handle of truth to it; and some of the tales about Mr. Wilson, although in themselves chiefly made up of untruths, yet contained enough truth to make them bitter and damaging. Friends, however, exerted themselves to cover over his faults, while his own sense of danger admonished him to be careful, so that, for a time, things appeared outwardly all right. But he merely restricted himself in the use of the stimulant to a less quantity, and that only for a time. As months passed on he began again to look upon the temptation with a willing eye, and drank as much as ever.

It was passing strange and very sad that a man professing to point the way to a higher and nobler life could not set the example to his fellow-creatures. But he did not conquer self, and so, while supposing himself to be standing, he "fell," and fell ignominiously.

It would be too sad to enter into all the details of that fall step by step. Suffice it to say that he had to leave the manse and go to London, to hide his shame and disgrace amid the throng of a great city. There he took to writing sermons for some years.

Then, as the dissipation told upon his brain, and he could no longer compose sermons fit for reproduction, he took to painting portraits. Yet the struggle between good and evil was a terribly dreadful one, for all his instincts and principles revolted against becoming the degraded outcast which he bade fair to be. Frequently for days, and even weeks, he would rigidly abstain from tasting drink, and bewail his folly with burning tears; then at the onslaught of temptation he would suddenly give way in childish weakness, and wallow once more in the dreadful mire of intoxication.

Portrait-painting supplied his wants for some time, although it failed to support his family. The poor wife broke down; crushed and stricken, she could not contend with the tide of misfortune and ruin any longer. Then, one and all of his three sons took to evil courses and went to destruction. One by one they committed felony, and coming within the clutches of the law suffered transportation for their crimes. The little daughter died prematurely of what appeared to be consumption, but what was in reality privation of proper food and lodging. As for the poor broken-hearted wife, she quickly sank into a pauper's grave, overwhelmed with her weight of woes, and then Edward Wilson was left to face the ruin he had accomplished, and to suffer alone.

But his career of lonely remorse was not for long. Every penny which he could beg, borrow, or earn by his pencil was spent in drink, while his only home was some railway arch or thieves' kitchen. Thus hardship and exposure and semi-starvation hastened his end, so that any unusual excess would inevitably prove fatal.

That excess came one day. Accidentally meeting with a friend of his young manhood, he concocted a tale of hardship and misery, which drew forth the sympathy of the listener and stirred every feeling of compassion. Giving him a half-sovereign, the gentleman bade the inebriate obtain a few little comforts, and engaged to see him, with a view to further steps for his benefit, in the evening. But by evening the drunkard had drank himself into a state of intoxication, and delirium tremens quickly supervened.

It was at that juncture that some boon companion escorted a friendly policeman to the poor wretch, who was raving and struggling fearfully. Without a minute's delay the official had Wilson conveyed to the workhouse, and here he would have died, "unknelled, uncoffined, and unknown," had not the aforesaid old acquaintance ferreted him out. Proceeding to the appointed place of meeting, he heard of the state in which his long-lost friend had been conveyed to the workhouse, and followed him thither.

But medical skill was of no avail. As the solemn hours of that night went on, his friend watched anxiously for any indication of returning strength and consciousness, but none came until just at the last. Then nature asserted its sway, and for a minute or two the mind of the poor haggard wretch rose superior to the body. Looking round upon those who stood by his bedside, and slowly gathering consciousness, he gasped out, "O God, is this the end! Must I fill a drunkard's grave?" Then another tremendous struggle came on, and while it lasted it took the united strength of his nurses to hold him. But all at once the muscles relaxed, the chin fell, and the gleaming eyes became fixed. Then it was seen that the spirit of Edward Wilson had gone forth on its unknown path to face its Master. "Wherefore, let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall" (1 Cor. 10 : 12).

THE COMING TRANSLATION OF CHRISTIANS.

By the Rev. J. G. Gregory, of Brighton, England.

IN the twelfth chapter of the Book of Revelation, where the approach of the end of this dispensation is referred to, the Church of Christ is brought before us under the figure of a woman clothed with the sun, whose child, about to be born, is anxiously waited for by the dragon; but, as soon as he is brought forth, God interferes on his behalf, and He is caught up to heaven. This done, the persecution commences against the woman and continues for a thousand, two hundred and threescore days—three and a half years.

This persecution is accompanied by a word of woe to the inhabitants of the earth and of the sea, for that the devil is come down to them, having greath wrath, because he knoweth he hath but a short time. Here the woman represents the Church of Christ. There is no room, I think, for doubt concerning it. But if this be granted, the details scarcely need a word of explanation. The man-child is the first fruits; a certain completed number of the Lord's elect, who shall be caught up to heaven. The Church immediately before the great tribulation gives forth this, her first-born, to the hand of God, who straightway takes it to Himself.

The woman in this twelfth chapter of Revelation then flies into the wilderness and remains there for three years and a half, nourished and protected by God, after her man-child had been caught up. There shall be, therefore, even while the tribulation of three and a half years lasts, a true and faithful Church: persecuted, but not forsaken; for we read that "the serpent cast out of his mouth water as a flood," that he might cause the woman to be carried away thereby; and that the dragon was wroth with the woman, and went to make war with the remnant of her seed which keep the commandments of God, and have the testimony of Jesus Christ."

But this allegorical evidence of a Church existing and persecuted, after the first-fruits have been removed, is corroborated by another passage more clear in the twentieth chapter. Here we find St. John, when speaking of the introduction of the Millennial reign, making reference to certain who should suffer martyrdom under "the beast" (which is the name given to the anti-Christ in the Book of Revelation), martyrs, therefore, who are to suffer death after the first-fruits of the earth shall have departed. (Rev. 20 : 4).

Thus it is evident that after the departure of the first-fruits; after the man-child shall be caught up to heaven; after the Lord's waiting people shall be taken away to meet their Saviour in the air, there shall be found on earth a Church—a people serving Christ in truth, and against these a persecution shall be effectually directed even unto death. But let us see how this can be, for there is a great difficulty here, a vast multitude out of every nation under heaven will have been taken hence.

The Lord will have descended into the heights above the world, invisibly, perhaps, to all, except His people; for there may not be any token granted to the unconverted world before the tribulation to warn them of the descent of Jesus into the air to call His saints.

The unbelievers will not, I think, hear a trumpet sound, nor will they see a lightning flash. They will, indeed, be witnesses of these things "immediately after the tribulation of those days, as the twenty-fourth chapter of St. Matthew testifies; but not before the tribulation. Probably the dead in Christ will be raised silently and invisibly, before suspicion is excited among men—no sod upturned, no grave disturbed, only the body gone; and so, perchance, it may be missed. Then, as suddenly, the removal of the living people of the Lord will follow. In silence also, and without a sign afforded to the unbelieving world (for anything that has appeared in Scripture to the contrary), they will be taken hence, drawn up at once to Christ. So they, too, will be missed, and sought for upon earth, but nowhere found.

But what may we expect will follow if the day of grace be not forever at that moment closed? Most certainly a great revival of religion. For imagine the sensation which must be produced among the unconverted masses. Two in a bed; one taken! two at a mill; one taken! two friends conversing; one taken! two men transacting business; one taken! Husband and wife, brother and sister, master and servant; one taken! Will not men begin to think? Will not many scoffers fall upon their knees and pray? Will not the Bible be searched with new eyes? Will not men's hearts fail them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth? Oh, methinks, there will be a stirring up of lukewarm ministers on that day; a crowding into churches such as never has been witnessed.

And so, we find—when this matter is dealt with in the fourteenth chapter of the Revelation—that immediately the first-fruits unto God and the Lamb are spoken of as being with the Lord above, an angel flies in the midst of heaven, "having the everlasting Gospel to preach to them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to Him, for the hour of His judgment is come."

But clearly, though there may be many who will truly turn to God in that day, yet the devil will find means to blind the masses of the world to the true state of things; for as we peruse the chapter we perceive that after Babylon is fallen, which is the next event that will transpire, and Antichrist is established upon His throne for three and a half years, then "the patience of the saints" is brought before us; and it is added, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth." And immediately takes place the harvest of the earth, which seems to be a second gathering together of God's people unto Him—perhaps through the medium of a fearful burst of persecution, which shall clear the earth of all who shall refuse the mark and worship of the Beast—and so the number of the Lord's Elect will be complete, and the way be rendered clear for the tremendous vintage of the wrath of God.

DR. TALMAGE'S FRIDAY EVENING TALK.

The Morey Letter—A Specimen of Villainy—The Caucus Must be Purified—Burial of Old Issues—The Death of Lucretia Mott—Successful Ministry of Women—Heavenly Vindication of Her Calling—The Slaughter of a Grasshopper Committee—The Stripping of the Leaves—Unrivalled Beauty of the American Fall—Poetic Slander—The Season of Migration—The Christian's Migration to Celestial Delights.

THE Presidential contest advancing in abuse and outrage came to its appropriate peroration yesterday when the Morey forgeries developed in the New York Court-House. The large volume of calumny needed a climacteric chapter. The fifth act of the drama needed to be more exciting than the other four acts. The confessed perjurers are at the bar. What a commentary on American politics! Nothing seems impossible in the way of villainy. The scheme laid for the turning of the national vote was the work of wilier brains than of the two scoundrels self-convicted. May the whole plot be explored and demonstrated.

In this, as in most cases of conspiracy, those get punished who are the mere instruments of adroit and elaborate wickedness. Generally great miscreants have genius enough to cover up their tracks; but sometimes all parties are tumbled into the light of public anathema and excoriation. So may it be now.

Before we come to another Presidential combat let the canvasses, the political organizations, the ballot-boxes, the great central committees, go through process of expurgation. There must be some way of putting best men to the front and worst men to the rear. Perjury, bribery, wholesale lying and defamation, must with scourge of small cords be whipped out of the national temple.

I am glad to believe that the two great political parties will never confront each other on again, but upon new ones, and hence they will cease to be the political parties that now they are. The Solid North and the Solid South will be split into a thousand fragments of preference and sentiment and interest.

Many of the old party hacks that had been hoping for more oats and better grooming under he incoming administration will be turned out on the deserts of neglect. Thousands of men who voted for General Garfield, because they annot get from him the post-offices, the con-ulships, the foreign embassies, the cabinet offices they expected, will make next summer not with their imprecation, and all things North, South, East, and West will be made ew. May we not hope and pray that out of he ruins there may be built up a brighter politi-al fabric, in which forgery, and bribe-taking, nd ruffianism shall have no foothold?

An event of the week that lifts us out of the urmoil of politics into a pure atmosphere is the eparture from Philadelphia last night of the Quaker preacher, he world-renowned orator and reformer. She as well on—as old as the nation—eighty-eight ears. The most of that time a benediction. he was eloquent with an almost supernatural oquence. Her voice will never die out from he plain meeting-houses of America and Eng-nd. I do not know that she was always right, ut I know she always meant to be right.

I lived for years among people who could not ention her name without tears of gratitude for hat she had been to them. Whatever was ought about the doctrine of woman's right to each in public, all those who heard her speak new she had a divine right of utterance.

In our own denomination we have had much ngry discussion and long-resounding trouble the question of woman's preaching; but, eanwhile, woman in ten thousand places is eaching unchallenged—preaching in Bible asses, preaching in orphan asylums, preaching in places of influence and power, preaching in places of suffering and crime, preaching in the cabins of the poor; and I venture the opinion that when the nations of this world are saved and finally gathered into one great audience in Heaven, if it were put to vote, and it were said, "All those of these millions who were brought to God through the ministry of woman will step to the right, and all those who were brought to God through the ministry of man will step to the left," a mighty majority would go to the right.

So on this subject of

we will let the tides drift, for the same reason we let the tides of the ocean rise or fall, because God controls them, and all the ecclesiastical councils of the earth cannot vote the Atlantic Ocean one inch up or one inch down.

My theology is of olden type, and I believe in God's eternal decree to make this world better and brighter; and all the attempts of bad men, or small-minded men to turn the world are as grasshoppers on the track before the 3.30 P.M. express train on the Michigan Central. To regulate the train, a great presbytery, or conference, or association of grasshoppers assemble at two o'clock in the afternoon, and having elected the gravest of all the grasshoppers for moderator, a vote is passed. Resolved, That railroad trains are bad things, that they go too fast, and that the three largest grasshoppers that ever emigrated from Kansas be a committee to halt the train this afternoon and arrest the engineer and conductor.

The committee of three go out to do their solemn duty, and one on each iron rail, and one half way between the rails, await the coming of the train, while all the convention of grasshoppers sit on the banks and watch. After a while the headlights of the locomotive flash around the curve, and the wheels roar, and one of the grasshoppers is to seize the cow-catcher, and one is to seize the conductor, and the other is to seize the engineer. Whew! Funeral of three grasshoppers the next day! All martyrs of conservatism. Moral: It takes more than three grasshoppers to stop a train.

The third event of the week is the stripping of the leaves from the trees in

A STOUT NORTHEASTER.

Walk last week and walk this week through the parks, and you'see a great transformation.

There is at such a time a passage of Scripture which everybody quotes, and yet quotes with a half misinterpretation: "We all do fade as a leaf." Well, if we fade as brightly and as beautifully as do the leaves, we need not dread the fading. Our autumnal forests are unparalleled in any other lands. Intelligent and poetic foreigners come to see the pageant of our hills just as people used to go to Paris in August to see the Napoleonic carnival, or go every ten years to Germany to see the Passion Play.

The changing foliage on the Rhine is not to be compared with that of the Hudson, nor that of the Alps with that of the Alleghanies. The fountain of American color is deeper than the trans-Atlantic fountains. The frost has a more skilful pencil here than in other atmospheres. Some of you passed this autumn unmoved before that which European artists cross the stormy ocean to see. Many nervous people at this season get depressed.

James Martineau sighs about the autumn, and says:

"It cries out in the night wind and shrill hail. It steals the summer bloom from the infant cheek. It makes old age shiver at the heart. It goes to the churchyard and chooses many a grave. It flies to the bell, and enjoins it when to toll."

All of which I pronounce

POETIC SLANDER.

Autumn does not slay one half as many as summer, but still to many this season is productive of melancholy. They are reminded of nothing but decay and death and graveyards, when the chief lesson ought to be one of coronation.

The only real triumph that the forest has is in the autumn. The sober green takes on carnivals of color, and the fashions of the hill become more gay. Here and there, during the Presidential conflict, we had banners stretched across the street, but for the last month, from Mount Washington to the Sierra Nevadas, there were banners lifted—banners of the King, banners of autumal joy, banners of fire. Instead of leading us down into the dust and darkness, they ought to lead us on and up toward the country where our best possessions lie.

Besides that, it is

THE SEASON OF MIGRATION.

A few days ago I entered the Park, and the twitter and the chirp, and the carol and the call of the birds were all bewildering. Where were they going to? I knew without asking. Going South—going to groves of magnolias, going to orange plantations, going among the bananas.

Have you ever watched the birds at the time of their migration? There is a flock, and here a flock, fifty different flocks making excursions for a few miles out, and then coming back, so strengthening their wings for a longer flight, and then coming back for seeming consultation. The fact is, they want to know just the time to start south. They must not go too soon, for that would leave our forests silent before their time. They must not start too late, lest the poor things are overcome on the way.

So a squadron of birds sails out in one direction, and comes back and reports the condition of the cornfields, and another squadron of birds sails out in another direction, and comes back to report the condition of the ponds and rivers, to see if there be any film of ice on the waters; and then another squadron of birds sails out to meet a squadron from farther north, so as to find what weather we may expect from the Arctics, and one afternoon they all come together, until the woods for miles around are filled with the feathered tribe, and the next morning they start—not in flocks, a flock here and a flock there, as before—but in one great company, darkening the air as they sweep over in silence for the most part, for they have a long voyage of air before them, and know not what heat, or cold, or lightning, or tempest may cross their path. On and on across the Hudson, across the Chesapeake, across the Savannah, across the lagoons. "Yet the stork in the Heaven knoweth her appointed time, and the turtle and the crane and the swallow observe the time of her going."

So we ought all to be aglee at the thought of migration suggested in this autumnal weather. Going to more genial clime when we get through with this.

GOING TO BETTER ATMOSPHERE.

Going not among icicles. but among blossoms. Going swiftly, not by way of the cemetery, but straight, as a bird flies, to the open windows of Heaven. But if I shut the gates of Heaven and look back to earth, I can see we are coming to one of the best and brightest seasons of all the year. Season best for sociality, best for study, best for church work.

On winter nights the stars are brighter. Longer evenings to read. It is winter that develops nations. Perpetual summer enervates and bedwarfs. No great things have been done by nations which had no experience of frost and cold. Health comes down horsed on the north wind. Most of us feel stronger in January than in August. At the season when we are at our best let us be most busy for God and the welfare each of each. While the ponds freeze over, and the lakes freeze over, and the rivers freeze over, let none of us have frozen nerves, or frozen affections, or a frozen soul. Warmer be our hopes, warmer our activities, until we shall exchange the fitful climate of earth for the eternal June of Heaven.

The trees of life are never frost-bitten; the crystal river from under the throne will never freeze; and the sea that St. John saw was not a cold expanse, but warm as well as glittering. A sea of glass, mingled with fire.

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

SUMMARY OF THE STORY.

May Lindsay, the heroine of the story, is the orphan daughter of a physician. After her father's death, her half-sister Maggie went to reside with her aunts, but May resolved on earning her own living. She received an offer of marriage from Claude Ellis, an old friend to whom she was sincerely attached; but he had during his college life imbibed skeptical opinions upon religion, and after a struggle with herself she refused his offer on that account. She accepted an engagement as companion to Evelyn Trafford, the invalid daughter of Sir William Trafford, of Alliston Hall. There her duties were light, and she grew to love Evelyn, who treated her as an equal and a friend. Evelyn had been injured by a fall from her horse, and it was necessary that she should be constantly in a recumbent position for some months. Evelyn had a girlish love for her cousin Donald, but her father disliked him because he was idle and extravagant. During a short holiday May Lindsay went to visit her half-sister, and while there, heard a sermon by Mr. Claremont, the clergyman of the locality, which convinced her that she ought to speak to Evelyn on the question of personal religion. On her return, she found visiting Evelyn a Miss Alice Fitzgerald, to whom her old suitor, Claude Ellis had become engaged. Claude Ellis himself subsequently spent a day at Alliston Hall.

An Unwelcome Guest.

I began to think that my stay at Alliston Hall was drawing to a close, for when Evelyn was able to return to the gay and active life that she had led before her illness, she would not need me any longer; but when I once hinted at something of the kind to her, she vehemently declared that I should never leave her, and that she should be ill again directly, if I were to go away.

If I had had a pleasant life before it was still more pleasant now, for we were able to drive out together, or to sit with our work on a seat on the lawn whenever the weather was warm enough.

I shall never forget that spring. Everything looked so lovely in that beautiful park. The long avenue with its budding trees; the soft, fresh green of the grass; the woods yellow with primroses, and the birds singing their happy songs in the trees; everything seemed full of life and of joy.

Evelyn was like a bird which has been long shut up in a cage and has suddenly regained its liberty. Her merry laugh was to be heard almost all day long, and her light step, as she went about the house again, showed that she was fast recovering her health and strength.

Yet one thought troubled me. Could it be that the opportunity was gone—that I should never now be able to lead her to think seriously about her soul and about eternity? I had tried so very often since my visit to Branston to begin to talk to her about these things, but the attempt had always ended in failure; and though I prayed most earnestly that God would make a way for me, and give me the opportunity for which I was now eagerly watching, yet no way seemed to be opened, no opportunity seemed to be given. And now Evelyn was getting well, and what chance was there that she would be led to think seriously when all around her was so bright and pleasant? Still I prayed on.

I had found out a few poor people in the neighborhood of Alliston Hall among whom I was able to do a little work for the Master. There were one or two old people who were glad for me to read to them, and there was a girl, dying in consumption, who was always pleased to see me. Thus, whenever I managed to get an afternoon for myself, when Evelyn was engaged with visitors, or was driving out with her father, I went across the park to visit these poor people, and always came back feeling refreshed in mind and body.

One afternoon I had been out rather longer than usual. I had left Evelyn busy with her letters, and, as it was now past post-time, I was afraid she would be wanting me, and would think that I had been a long time away. So, as soon as I had dressed for dinner, I hurried down to Evelyn's room.

As I came up to the door I heard a voice inside, and when I went in I found, to my astonishment, that a young man was there. He was sitting on a footstool in front of the fire, stroking Evelyn's little dog, and was apparently quite at his ease. He was a very handsome man, tall and well-built, with fine features and large dark eyes.

Who could he be? Where had he come from? I had not heard that any visitors were expected that day, and I was utterly at a loss to account for his sudden appearance.

He jumped up when I came into the room, and threw himself into the arm-chair by the fire.

"This is Cousin Donald, May," said Evelyn as I came up to her; "do you think papa will be very angry with him for coming?"

"Oh, no, of course not; why should he be?" said Mr. Trafford carelessly; "when a poor fellow has been toiling away day after day for months it would be a crying shame to grudge him a little change of air when he happens to get a day's holiday."

"Don't you like the bank any better, Donald?" asked Evelyn.

"Any better!" exclaimed Mr. Trafford, starting from his seat; "I hate it, Evelyn. I shall run away some day, I declare I shall."

"Oh, no, you won't, there's a dear, good Donald," she said; "papa would be so angry."

"I can't help that, Evelyn," he said; "you would run away if you were in my place; it is nothing but work, work, work, day after day, and I hate work, I can't help it, it is my nature. I was never meant to work; some people are, and they like work; but I never did, and never shall."

At this moment Sir William's step was heard in the corridor.

"Here's papa," said Evelyn hurriedly. "Oh, Donald, I wonder what he will say.'

"I don't care," said Mr. Trafford, with a laugh; "if the old gentleman has the least sense of—"

But here the door opened, and Sir William came in.

His nephew rose to meet him in the most affectionate and confident manner, and as if he were perfectly sure of a welcome.

'Well, uncle, how are you?" he said; "I'm so glad to find Evelyn better; it is so nice to see you again, uncle."

Sir William took his hand and shook it coldly.

"And pray where did you come from, Donald?" he said sternly.

"Why, the fact is, uncle," said the young man, "to-day is a bank holiday, and I have been working so hard lately that I thought a little fresh air would set me up again, and as I had not seen you for such a long time, I thought I would look you up."

"When I was a young man, Donald," said his uncle dryly, "'I waited for an invitation before I went to visit my friends."

Mr. Trafford colored, but he answered gayly, "I can put up at the 'Royal Oak' to-night, uncle, if it is at all inconvenient for me to stay here; I did not think the house would be full at this time of year."

Sir William did not answer him, but turning to Evelyn, told her that the gong had sounded, and asked her if she wished to go down-stairs to dinner.

"No, papa," said Evelyn; "I think May and I will dine up-stairs. I feel rather tired this evening."

"Very well, then, we will go down-stairs, Donald," said Sir William; and they left the room.

"Oh, dear, May," said Evelyn, as soon as the door was shut, "I am afraid papa is very angry; I never saw him look so vexed before. But I don't know why he should be so angry, do you? It isn't as if Donald was no relation of ours, and I am sure he is very nice. I can't think why papa is always so vexed when he comes here."

"I am very sorry you are so tired, Evelyn dear," I said, as I made her lie down on the sofa till dinner was brought up-stairs.

"Oh, I'm not so very tired, May," she said, "but I wanted papa and Donald to have dinner alone, because, don't you see, papa will be obliged to talk to him now. If we were there I know just how it woud be. Papa would talk to you and talk to me, and hardly say a word to Donald. But now, you see, he must talk to him, because there is no one else there, and you will see they will be quite friendly after dinner; at least matters will be much better than they are now."

And, to a certain extent, Evelyn was right. When we went into the library we found Mr. Trafford sitting comfortably in an easy-chair, with the Times newspaper in his hand, discussing the events of the day with his uncle, apparently quite at his ease, and looking as comfortable as if his presence in Alliston Hall was the result of an urgent and pressing invitation.

And Sir William? He was not at his ease. I could see that by his tightly-compressed mouth when his nephew was speaking, and by the careful way in which he tried to engross Evelyn's attention as soon as she came into the room. But still I could see that he found it very difficult to keep up any appearance of displeasure in the face of Mr. Trafford's pleasant, cheerful manner, and almost impossible to quarrel with a man who was quite determined not to quarrel with him.

Evelyn was very silent the whole evening, and seemed in bad spirits. She talked a little to me, but she very seldom spoke to her father or her cousin. Altogether it was a most uncomfortable evening, and I was not sorry when it was over.

The next day we did not see much of Mr. Trafford, for Sir William took him out with him after breakfast, and managed to keep him to himself nearly the whole day. Only once, when Sir William was unavoidably absent for a short time, was he left in the library with Evelyn and me.

"I wish you liked the bank better, Donald," said Evelyn as soon as her father had left the room.

"I never shall like it better, Evelyn," he said impetuously; "it is absurd my trying to live in London on the miserable allowance I get there. It is utterly ridiculous; no gentleman could do it."

"But Donald," Evelyn said, "you really should be more careful of your money; you ought never to have bought—"

At a sign from him she stopped suddenly short in what she was saying.

"You really ought not; ought you, Donald?" she said instead.

"Yes, I ought, Evelyn," he said in rather an annoyed voice; "it's all right. But it is really absurd their paying a fellow such a miserable salary. I don't mean to stand it much longer. I shall run away, and try my fortune somewhere else."

"Oh, no, Donald dear, you must not run away," said Evelyn beseechingly; "just think how angry papa would be!"

But just then Sir William came back, and invited Mr. Trafford to walk with him as far as his farm-bailiff's house, and we did not see him again until he came to take leave of us before starting for the railway station. He whispered something to Evelyn as he bent over her to say good-by, and I distinctly caught the words, "Remember—promise;" and then he hastily shook hands with me and went out of the room.

I never knew Evelyn so difficult to please as she was that evening. Nothing that I did seemed to be right, and she was fretful and tired; and even when her father was in the room she made no effort to rouse herself or to talk to him.

Sir William looked at her very anxiously from time to time. I could see that he attributed this change in her to her cousin's visit, and I heard him once expressing a hope that that was the very last time that Master Donald would come without an invitation; he did not approve o the free-and-easy manners of the rising generation, and he was glad that he had spoken to him pretty plainly on the subject.

Evelyn went early to bed, and I went to my room, but not to sleep. I felt very unhappy and perplexed. Those two words which I had heard against my will, haunted me: "Remember—promise."

What did he mean by it? What was Evelyn remember, and what promise had she made ich she would not speak either to her father to me? It was so unlike Evelyn to keep a ret. She generally came out with everything once, and told me just what she was thinking out. I felt sure that this must be something did not wish her father to know, and the ought troubled me very much indeed.

As I got up the next morning I prayed for ce and strength to help me, if possible, to innce Evelyn to do what was right.

JACOB AND PHARAOH.

S. Lesson for Nov. 28th; Gen. 47 : 1-12. den Text, Prov. 16 : 31. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HE life of Jacob was full of vicissitudes, and his racter of inconsistencies. A man of God, yet r and anon failing to rely upon Him; the ject of God's promises, and yet betraying n time to time a painful mistrust as to their lment; a man who built altars to the Lord held real communion with God, and yet was d, more than once, to possess idols in his se (Gen. 31 : 34; 35 : 2). He was a man who under the special blessing of the Lord, and was often a prey to suffering, which he ght upon himself. How like the state of y of God's children in the present day, who a life which is in part a life of faith, but in h self-reliance and self-will play a prominent grievous part. God is always patient and ciful, but how little such believers honor , or walk worthy of the vocation wherewith are called!

cob was getting old; it was no easy thing m to seek a new home; but impelled by his for Joseph, and the prospect of sustenance 's large family, he "took his journey, with hat he had, and came to Beersheba." Here grandfather Abraham had prayed, and led there on the name of the Lord, the everg God" (Gen. 21 : 33); and here it was he himself had lived in peace with his nts, before his deceit had caused him to be n forth from his home. There were holy precious associations connected with the , and Jacob "offered sacrifices unto the God father Isaac." It was a solemn thing for who had been twenty years of his life a ger in a foreign land, and had been brought again by God's grace into Canaan, to leave s old age that land which God had promised m and to his seed.

bably he asked counsel of his God, "for spake unto Israel in the visions of the night, aid, Jacob, Jacob. And he said, Here am nd He said, I am God, the God of thy r: fear not to go down into Egypt; for I here make of thee a great nation. I will wn with thee into Egypt; and I will also bring thee up again: and Joseph shall put and upon thine eyes." Oh, the tenderness d! Jacob had not yet arrived at the conn of Abraham, "Shall not the Judge of all rth do right?" (Gen. 18 : 25); he made d his second and not his first resource; he t unto Him when there was a special need, id not live habitually in His immediate nce. Yet whenever he did seek His aid the was ready to bless him, and did not so as reproach him.

thus God deals with all His children. He th to all men liberally and upbraideth not" s 1 : 5); but they who are men of little ose much more than they think of the presolemn nearness of God in the details of It is blessed to be able to appeal to God se of emergency, but oh! how infinitely lessed to be able to testify, "He is at my hand, I shall not be moved" (Ps. 16 : 8). assured His servant, not only telling him the right way for him, but pledging Himaccompany him. When we are quite sure od is with us in any course we are pursuing. an be no longer room for fear or anxiety. resence is our guarantee of safety and of g in all things which may happen unto us.

Jacob made no stipulation with God as to the length of his sojourn in Egypt. It might have occurred to him, "If I leave the land of Canaan and take away my family, flocks, herds, and all my possessions, then I lose the right of sojourn which my stay and that of my fathers has procured for me; might it not be wiser to leave at least one son behind as my representative?" No, that were not real faith, God could make him a great nation in Egypt as well as in Canaan. Thus he went out in full trust, like the blind whom God has promised to lead "by a way that they know not" (Isa. 42 : 16).

When he reached the land of Egypt Jacob sent Judah "before him unto Joseph, to direct his face unto Goshen; and they came into the land of Goshen. And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen, and presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while. And Israel said unto Joseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive." Thus God gave him back his son, and the old love was all unhindered by the state and grandeur of Joseph. It was Joseph's heart which beat against his; all the surroundings were of little import—the father had found his son.

Then Joseph returned to make arrangements with Phararoh for his family. He was not ashamed of his poor humble relations, and made no assumption that they were anything better than was really the case; the modern debasing pride of position was at least unknown to Joseph, and instead of putting them through a little education as to how they should behave, what they should say to the king about their ordinary life and what they should keep back, there was a grand simplicity in Joseph's action. He said unto his brethren, 'It shall come to pass, when Pharaoh shall call you, and shall say, What is your occupation? that ye shall say, Thy servants' trade hath been about cattle from our youth even until now, both we, and also our fathers: that ye may dwell in the land of Goshen; for every shepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians." They might have desired to dwell in the palace, and to make use of Joseph's position to aggrandize themselves. It is in poor human nature to make use of any pedestal to raise itself into prominence. But the elevation of Joseph was due neither to his birth nor to his intrinsic talents; the secret of all was, "the Lord was with Joseph." Instead of acting as Samuel did later, who made his sons, men utterly unqualified, judges over Israel (1 Sam. 8 : 1–3), Joseph never made use of his own circumstances to benefit his family in unnecessary, but only in necessary things, for his eye was single. God had shown him that they should bow down to him—i.e., should take a position inferior to him, and no personal consideration, even for Benjamin, would make him alter the clear direction of his God.

He "came and told Pharaoh, and said, My father and my brethren, and their flocks and their herds, and all that they have, are come out of the land of Canaan; and behold, they are in the land of Goshen. And he took some of his brethren, even five men, and presented them unto Pharaoh." To the king's inquiry, "What is your occupation?" they answered as Joseph had directed them, "Thy servants are shepherds, both we, and also our fathers;" they told him of their intention to sojourn in the land, because in the land of Canaan there was no pasture for their flocks, and they made this petition, "Now therefore, we pray thee, let thy servants dwell in the land of Goshen."

Pharaoh's gratitude to Joseph was manifest in his large-hearted beneficence to his family. He conferred no vain titles or useless honor upon them, but gave them a large landed property, a substantial means of subsistence. "The land of Egypt is before thee: in the best of the land make thy father and thy brethren to dwell; in the land Goshen let them dwell; and if thou knowest any men of activity among them, then make them rulers over my cattle." This grand old king would let every man stand on his own merits. Responsible positions were not then put into the hands of such as could obtain them by the interest of party, or by personal influence with the king. Pharaoh's judgment was that he who had the spirit of God in a practical manner was the man fitted to govern the nation, while an active, energetic man could govern the cattle. Often in our days the order is reversed; we find spiritual men among our shepherds, our working men, and women, but oh, how few among our princes and statesmen!

Joseph, who saw things in all their reality, and not as men see them, brought in Jacob his father, and set him before Pharaoh, and Jacob blessed Pharaoh. "Without all contradiction the less is blessed of the better" (Heb. 7 : 7). In Joseph's eyes his humble old father, who had been a shepherd all his life, was better than Pharaoh, the greatest monarch of the age; for Jacob was an inheritor of the promises of God; as under a special provision of His standing grace as being blessed, and as being a channel whereby all the nations of the earth should be blessed, he had the power and the right to bless Pharaoh. Taken in themselves, how noble was Pharaoh, how mean and faulty was Jacob; but Jacob nevertheless lived for God, and sought after the living God and eternal things.

If it was the privilege of the tribe of Levi "to bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord, to stand before the Lord, to minister unto Him, and to bless in His name" (Deut. 10 : 8), is it not then our privilege, as separated unto the Lord by the death of His Son, to be witnesses of His covenant, to stand before Him, "minister unto Him, and to bless in His name?" Do we use this privilege? and if not, why not? Are we standing in and witnessing to the covenant, the new covenant in which the law of God is put into our minds and written in our hearts? (Heb. 8 : 10). Are we always, in every moment, standing before God, in His acknowledged and realized presence? and is, therefore, the bent of every thought, word, and act Godward, and thus full of God, yea, "filled with all the fulness of God?" Are we competent "to bless in His name," to bring others, consciously or unconsciously, in contact with Him by our very presence? Bless God, this is a glorious possibility, and, faulty, unworthy though we are, let us at least take our right place as they who are crucified with Christ, nothing in ourselves, yet, as members of His body, able to "bless in His name."

Pharaoh did not despise the old man's blessing. Our golden text says, "The hoary head is a crown of glory, if it be found in the way of righteousness;" but, again, let us remember it was neither Jacob's age nor yet his personal worth, but only the Word of his God, which could make him to be a blessing. "Pharaoh said unto Jacob, How old art thou? And Jacob said unto Pharaoh, The days of the years of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years; few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage." Abraham lived a hundred and seventy-five years, and Isaac a hundred and eighty (Gen. 25 : 7; 35 : 28). Yes, Jacob's days were few in comparison, and evil in comparison, with the all-conquering faith of Abraham's life, perhaps more so than he knew.

"Joseph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses, as Pharoah had commanded. And Joseph nourished his father, and his brethren, and all his father's household, with bread, according to their families," or (margin) "as a little child is nourished." Thus were his dreams fulfilled; thus did God accomplish all which He had led him to expect; thus faithful and true is our God to His promises, "For the vision is yet for an appointed time, but at the end it shall speak, and not lie; though it tarry, wait for it; because it will surely come, it will not tarry" (Hab. 2 : 3).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Ministerial Crisis in France has Occurred at the very first session of the French Legislature. The bitter feeling aroused among the anti-Republicans by the enforcement of the religious decrees showed itself conspicuously, one of the deputies going so far as to bestow the epithet of "burglars" upon those who were responsible for the execution of those decrees. The government made a strong appeal at the outset for the full and unreserved confidence of the Chambers, or an open expression of want of confidence. The deputies refused to give priority, as the ministry asked, to the educational bills, which involve the question of religious instruction. In spite of the protests of many members, the ministry insisted upon regarding this as a vote of want of cónfidence, and tendered their resignations. At the urgent request of M. Grevy and M. Gambetta, the Premier subsequently withdrew his resignation, but the ministry does not command the confidence of the country.

The British Premier, Speaking at the Annual banquet of the Lord Mayor of London, on November 9th, intimated that the forbearance of government toward the Irish malcontents was nearly exhausted. He made the significant remark that "the maintenance of public order is to be considered before the improvement of the law," which may be taken as an indication that the agrarian crimes perpetrated and threatened are likely to defer remedial legislation. He also said that the government would not shrink from the duty of asking for increased powers if the ordinary provisions of the law proved insufficient to repress the intimidation, crime, and infringement of citizens' rights which now prevail. This announcement has taken the country by surprise, for the impression had prevailed that Mr. Gladstone was resolved to rely exclusively on legislative concessions to tranquilize Ireland.

It is possible that the attitude he has now assumed may have a salutary influence on the leaders of the agitation. They know that Mr. Gladstone alluded to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act when he spoke of "increased powers," and there is no power they dread so much as that, because it places them, as well as their dupes, in peril. So long as that Act, which is the great safeguard of liberty, remains in force, it is possible for the crafty leaders to escape punishment, through want of evidence implicating them in the crime, to the commission of which they have instigated their ignorant followers. But if the authorities acquire, by the suspennsion of the Act, the power to arrest and imprison suspected persons without a formal indictment, then the situation becomes perilous for the wily plotters, and Mr. Gladstone's menace may therefore check their operations. It is well known that the British Parliament will readily grant the suspension of the Act if Mr. Gladstone asks for that power.

A House Besieged in a Time of Peace is a strange spectacle in a civilized country, yet such a spectacle was seen lately in Ireland. A visitor in County Mayo saw a gentleman doing the work of a shepherd while his wife attended to other farm work usually done by laborers. On inquiry he found that the house was in a state of siege. Men under the command of the Land League surrounded it, prepared to kill the owner if he ventured outside the premises, and who would not permit any man to gather in the crops, which were rotting on the ground. No one was allowed to approach the house, even to sell its occupants a morsel of food. This state of affairs being made public, a number of laborers from a distance, under the leadership of a resolute captain of rifle volunteers, immediately set out to the assistance of the proscribed man. They were well armed, and were resolved to force their way against all resistance. The British government, fearing a conflict, sent a troop of cavalry with the relief expedition, and now the laborers are at work gathering in the crops, protected by British soldiers, a scene such as probably no other land calling itself civilized could furnish.

Captain Boycott, the besieged farmer, is an Englishman, who settled some years ago at Lough Mask House, near Ballinrobe, on a farm which he has improved and in which he has sunk considerable capital. He accepted the agency of Lord Erne's estates, comprising about 40,000 acres, and in managing those estates appears to have acted with strict justice, though without much mercy, toward the occupiers who refused to pay rent. Hence the hatred excited against him. The Land League warns him that as soon as his military protectors have left he will be murdered, and orders him to leave the country. As Captain Boycott has sunk all his capital in the farm, he is reluctant to obey, and being a high-spirited man, is also ashamed to submit to intimidation; but it is probable that if he remains he will be murdered.

Violent Storms and Floods are Reported from all parts of Great Britain. Enormous damage has been done, and, although the loss of life on land has been but small, the fatalities at sea have been fearful. It is said that the oldest seaman never remembers such rough weather. Great excitement was created on the Liverpool Exchange by the constant arrival of telegram after telegram announcing wrecks. At Parkgate, near Chester, the floods accumulated against the sea wall, and ultimately washed away a considerable part of it. The low-lying districts of South Yorkshire have also suffered severely, so disastrous a storm not having been known there for many years. There have been fifty wrecks near Hornsea alone. Hundreds of sailors, it is feared, have perished on the English coast.

The Invasion of Persia by the Kurds is Giving great alarm to the government of that country. The Sheik Abdullah has declared himself an independent sovereign, and issued a proclamation in which he calls upon the Turkish and Persian Kurds to unite under his rule. That leader can bring into the field 40,000 fine horsemen, and has already captured the town of Uramiyah. So wretched is the condition of the Persian army that its resistance to the invaders can be but feeble at the best.

"Christian Work in Borneo" is the Title of an interesting paper in the November number of "The Gospel in All Lands," in which the writer describes the past history and present condition of missionary effort there. Few people know anything of a land which, from its physical conditions and the strange character of its inhabitants, presents many features of interest. It appears that the A.B.C.F.M. had four missionaries there in 1839, but owing to death and other causes the work of the Board in the island has been suspended, though European missionaries are laboring there with success.

Two Members of the Salvation Army, Frank Watson and William Fyfe, were killed in the great colliery accident at Seaham, England, when 168 lives were lost. Watson had been a consistent Christian for two years, and is a great loss to the Army. On the Saturday before the explosion occurred he stood up at the evening prayer-meeting and said, "My lamp is trimmed and burning bright on the way to glory." Fyfe had been a thoroughly wicked man, but his conversion made him a new man to himself and to his family. One day, as a detachment of the Army was marching along South Railway Street, a saloon-keeper came out to the door and shouted, "Come back, Billy, and I'll give you a pint of beer." But Fyfe answered, "Oh, no, I don't want it."

A Tradesman Becoming an Idiot.—The Rev. W. Evans, of Leicester, England, relates: "Close by where I was lodging there was a man who was being cared for by one engaged for the purpose. He was a drivelling idiot. He used to go about the hedges picking leaves and making us presents of them. You could tell from what was left of him that he had been a handsome man.

"I inquired into his history. He had had a splendid business, but he took to drink, and his wife joined him. He became so incapable that he had to be removed from his business into lodgings close by me, and an allowance wa made him of thirty shillings a week. Sometimes he was almost mad, and would insist upo having money to spend, though the regulatio was that he was not to have it. In order t pacify him, the woman attending him was sometimes obliged to give him half-a-crown, when h would go and buy a bottle of gin, and drink right off. His wife died drunk. He was intox icated at the time, but could see something wa the matter, and while she was dying he was pu ting on her bonnet and shawl, thinking that tak ing her into the open air would do her good Such are the doings of drink, and yet people ar saying we are making a fuss about nothing i trying to persuade people from touching, tas ing, or handling it."

The Lion and Lord Mayor of London.—A St. Katherine Cree Church, London, on Satu day, October 23d, the Rev. W. M. Whittemor D.D., preached what is termed the annu "Lion" sermon. In the course of his remark he alluded to the fact that about 250 years ag upon that very day Sir John Gayer, a citizen London, who afterward became Lord Mayo was in the deserts of Arabia upon business whic required his own personal attention. By som means he became detached from the carava and while quite alone and unarmed he w much alarmed at seeing a lion approaching hin Scarcely knowing what to do, he fell upon h knees and asked the Lord to deliver him fro his perilous position. The lion looked at hi savagely, but upon seeing him in this positio after a few moments walked away in an opposi direction. The merchant, on rising from h knees, made a solemn vow that upon his safe r turn home he would commemorate this prov dential deliverance by some benevolent ac Upon reaching England he accordingly left sum of money to provide for this sermon eve year.

GRACE DARLING, the Lighthouse-Keeper's Daughter.

GRACE DARLING.

The Lighthouse-Keeper's Bride—Life on the Rock—The Wreck—Cries for Help—Grace Darling's Project—Difficulty with Father and Mother—The Daring Rescue—Popular Plaudits—Illness and Death.

THE numerous maritime disasters which, during the last few months, have sent a thrill of horror through the community, have also aroused an unusual degree of sympathy with those who "go down to the sea in ships—who do business in great waters." Not only on our own coasts, but on Transatlantic shores, there have recently been wrecks in great numbers, in which many precious lives have been lost, and many more would have perished but for the exertions of brave men who, at the peril of their own lives, went to the rescue of those in imminent danger. Public attention, being thus turned to the subject of ocean disasters, the narrative of a famous rescue effected some years ago may be considered timely. It was a rescue in which a brave, noble girl played so conspicuous a part that her name is known in every land, and is never mentioned but in terms of praise and honor. The following details of her life and of the event which has shed lustre on her name are gleaned from a memorial published soon after her early death:

In the early part of the present century Longstone Lighthouse, at the Farne Islands, off the Scottish coast, a perilous post, was in the charge of a young man named William Darling. He fell in love with Miss Horsley, a farmer's daughter, living in a comfortable home among safe fields, where the roar of the sea could not reach her. The life of the wife of a lighthouse keeper must needs be isolated and monotonous; and she knew that if she consented to take upon herself the responsibility of such a post she must be willing to forego many of the pleasures to which she had been accustomed, to bear long absences from the friends of he girlhood, and to be contented with the society of her husband alone.

But such a prospect never yet frightened the loving heart of a devoted woman, and Miss Horsley loved William Darling. Therefore she cared very little where her home might be, if only she could share it with him. So Miss Horsley became Mrs. Darling. Events proved that her estimate of the young man's character was correct. He was an intelligent man, fond of books, and having a thoughtful and cultvated mind; and, best of all, he was a true Christian.

God gave them a family of several boys and girls, of whom our heroine, Grace Horsley Darling, born in 1815, was the youngest but two. They were educated by their father, and had a fair supply of books. Grace Darling was always distinguished by intelligence and amiability. Her life up to the age of twenty was spent almost entirely on the lighthouse rock, with the exception of one or two short visits to friends on the mainland, in the course of which an attachment sprang up between her and a young man named George Herbert.

It was on Wednesday evening, September 5, 1838, when Grace Darling was twenty-three years old, that the Forfarshire steamer, a vessel of about three hundred tons burden, sailed from Hull. Sixty-three persons sailed in her, including twenty passengers in the cabin and nineteen in the steerage, Captain Humble, the master, his wife, fourteen seamen, four firemen, two coal trimmers, and two stewards.

Off Flamborough Head a leakage in the boilers was detected, and continued for six hours; but it did not appear to be very serious, inasmuch as the pumps were able to keep the vessel dry. Still it was enough to cause some alarm, for two of the fires were extinguished by it, and had to be relighted when the boilers had been temporarily repaired. The vessel could only move slowly.

It was about six o'clock on Thursday evening when the Forfarshire passed through the Fairway, the water which lies between the Farne Island and the mainland. It was night when she entered Berwick Bay, and at that time the wind was blowing strong from the north, and the sea was running very high. The firemen reported that they could not keep the fires burning, as the leakage had increased to such an extent that the water put them out.

The storm continued to rage with unabated fury, and it was felt by all on board that they were in imminent danger. The captain strove to keep up the courage of the men and passengers, but their anxious faces told too surely of the sinking hearts within.

"Where are we now?" was the question asked at ten o'clock; and those who asked would have given not a little to be in happy British homes, safe from the fury of the winds and sea. "We are off St. Abb's Head," was the reply.

Presently the engine-men, working hard at their engines, found that their efforts were entirely vain, and then they represented the case to the captain.

The captain looked and felt extremely anxious, for he knew that a terrible danger menaced the vessel and all on board. The sails were hoisted, but the vessel became unmanageable and drifted toward the rocks. At last there was a cry of "Breakers to leeward!" And presently, about three o'clock on Friday morning, the Forfarshire struck on a rock. Eight of the sailors and one passenger escaped in a boat, and were picked up the next day by a passing ship. The Forfarshire broke in two pieces, and the fore part of the vessel remained on the rock with nine people on it; but the remaining forty-five persons were carried away with the other part of the vessel and drowned.

That night Grace Darling could not sleep soundly. Very early in the morning something seemed to awake her.

"What was it that awoke me, I wonder? It might have been the wind; and yet it seemed to me more than the wind. It must have been human cries, but cries uttered in the most awful distress, or they could not have been heard above the gale."

So she said to herself, as, with white face and trembling pulse, she listened, and presently she heard piercing, penetrating cries of the nine persons on the fore part of the vessel stranded on the rock.

Then she sprang out of bed, and with trembling, agitated fingers, she hastened to dress, and then, without losing a moment, she hurried to her father. "Why, Grace, what is the matter, child?" said he.

"Oh, father, I feel sure there has been a wreck near! I have heard the most awful shrieks, and I am sure some poor persons are drowning."

"Nonsense, Grace. That which you thought a cry was only the wind; at least, we may hope so; for I do not think you could hear screams, or anything else, in such a storm."

"But, father, I am sure that the cries came from human beings in extremity. I know there is a wreck not far from the island."

Mr. Darling shook his head, and tried to appear indifferent. "Even if it is so, Grace, we can do nothing," said he.

"Oh, yes, father, we must go to their rescue," replied his daughter.

"What is the use of your talking like that, Grace? If your brothers were at home we might attempt it; but now it is altogether out of the question."

"No, indeed, father; it must not be out of the question. Can we let our fellow-creatures perish without making an effort to save them? If we did so, I am sure we should never, either of us, be happy again. Do let us go father! I can help you in the rowing of the boat, and God will protect us. Only think what it would be to save the lives of those poor half-drowned men and women!"

Mr. Darling looked anxiously through his telescope. It was scarcely light, and there was a heavy mist hanging over the island. The wind was not as violent as it had been, but the sea was still very furious. He strained his eyes as he looked through the good glass, and presently he saw, about half a mile away, the shipwrecked sufferers, still clinging to their only hope, the broken pieces of the ship. He thought for a moment or two, and Grace's earnest pleading prevailed. He knew that she never before had been called upon to render such assistance; but he knew, too, that she was a brave girl, and would do her best.

"Very well, Grace; I will let you persuade me, though it is against my better judgment." Grace joyfully kissed her father, and he began to prepare.

"What will your mother say, Grace?" he asked the next moment.

The loving girl dreaded her more than the waves. Mrs. Darling, when she heard of it, could not give her consent.

"Oh, William, I cannot believe that you will be so mad! If there has been a shipwreck, and lives lost, what is the use of your adding your own death to the number? Nothing can save you. The boat will not live ten minutes in such a sea. It is tempting Providence, and you ought to be afraid to do it," said the wife through her tears.

Mrs. Darling clung to her husband as if she would not let him go; but Grace remained true and steadfast to her noble purpose, and only waited till the mother grew a little more calm to press the matter again; and before long they could see that she had half yielded. That was enough!

"Good-by, mother. God will bring us back to you in safety, never fear; and no doubt we shall bring some poor half-drowned creatures with us, so you had better get the beds warmed and have everything comfortable," said Grace in strong, cheering tones.

Mrs. Darling found that all her beseeching was in vain; and she could only hope for the best, and keep herself as quiet as possible. She was, however, half frantic with fear, as she bade them good-by, and then watched, with streaming eyes, the fragile little boat venture out upon the awful waters. The wild waves were leaping and foaming around the little boat, and the wind blowing furiously. The affrighted sea-bird looked at them, and screamed shrilly as they saw the boat rocked to and fro, now leaping on the top of a wave that tossed it high, and now sinking down, down, as if it were going to the ver bottom of the deep. But Grace was not afraid She scarcely thought of the danger; for he heart and sympathy were with those who wer on the rock.

On they went, over the stormy waters, ever minute being nearer their goal. The foam dashe in the face of the intrepid girl, and the sal water made her eyes smart; but she did not relax her efforts, but kept nobly and steadily at he work.

"Are you getting tired, my girl?" her fathe asked presently.

"Not very, father. We shall do it," she replied.

"Yes, I really hope we shall. It is a good thin it is an ebb tide. If it had not been, we coul not have passed between the islands. It will b flowing when we come back; and if there ar no sailors to help us, we may as well make u our minds to stay on the rocks with the others for we shall not be able to get home again."

They pulled hard a little longer, and then contrived to reach the rock on which the sufferer were waiting.

With a tremendous effort William Darlin got on the rock, and immediately Grace rowe the boat back so as to keep her afloat on th water, and free of the dangerous reefs. In th mean time the sufferers on the rock had see the boat, and were full of hope.

"There is a boat coming," one had shoute to the rest; and the very words had quickenin force in them. They looked eagerly out, bu could scarcely believe that it would be in th power of those two occupants to rescue ther "One is a woman," said a sailor, with moistu in his eyes. "God bless her! she is an ang sent from heaven to succor us."

This man let the tears stream down his weathe en cheeks, while he watched the girl's ic efforts, and prayed fervently that God ld bless and prosper them.

illiam Darling could scarcely help weeping e he looked at the sufferers, for their state truly dreadful. They had strength enough however, to bless him and his, and he was kful to find the sailors not so utterly ex- ted but that they were able to render some tance.

"Who is to be the first?" cried Darling. e boat is ready, and by God's help we shall you all. Cheer up. Hope for the best, and yourselves as much as possible."

s cheery words had a magic effect upon the ers, who immediately "took heart again" ose to their feet in faith and hope. The est care and caution were necessary in to get the survivors safely into the boat.

They were accordingly summoned, and had the mournful satisfaction of hearing her last adieux.

"I wish to give you each some token of my love before I die," she said; and with her own hands, and with the most perfect calmness, she distributed her gifts among them.

As may well be supposed, their grief was very great, and they felt as if they could not bear to part from her. But she comforted them with the assurance of her own sure and certain hope of a joyful resurrection.

"Do not mourn for me," she said; "I am only exchanging this life for one far better. If I remained here I should be subject to trouble and sickness, but, in dying, I go to be with Christ my Saviour."

Just before she died she earnestly exhorted her relations to meet her in the eternal world of blessedness and peace; and then she peacefully passed away, on October, 20, 1842, "to be with Christ, which is far better." The tidings of her death were received everywhere with the most sincere regret.

Her mother, Mrs. Darling, died six years afterward, in 1848, at the age of seventy-four, and her father in 1865, at the age of seventy-nine.

THE AGITATION IN IRELAND

To Result in its Separation from Britain.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

IN the author's pamphlet on "Coming Wars," published some years ago, it was shown that the legislative separation of Ireland from Britain just before the final crisis of seven years is inevitable, because Ireland never belonged to Cæsar's Roman Empire, as Britain did.

Also, in his pamphlet in 1865, on "Menacing Perils in England" he wrote, "It is clear from the Book of Revelation that Ireland, being outside the Roman Empire, must be separated from England (which was inside the Roman Empire), and be constituted an independent nation."

In 1846 Dr. Kelsall in his treatise on "Antichrist," said: "The ten Gentile kingdoms, prefigured by the ten toes of the image and the ten horns of the beast, into which the whole Roman Empire (as it existed in the time of the Emperor Trajan) will become ultimately divided, will make their appearance so as to be distinctly recognized. Ireland was never brought within the limits of the Roman Empire, and probably does not come within the scope of the prophecy of the Ten Kingdoms. The present course of events in that island indicates that its separation from England, which was part of the Roman Empire, may hereafter take place. Belgium was within the limits of the Roman earth; Holland was not, and in 1832 they were separated. The restoration of the Kingdom of Greece in 1827, by its separation from Turkey, so as to form one of the Ten Kingdoms, is worthy of observation. It seems as if the Ten Kingdoms were gradually developing themselves."

Dr. Tregelles, in 1846, in his "Remarks on Daniel," said, in his description of the extent of the Roman Empire, "Britain, which had been invaded by Julius Cæsar in B.C. 55, and which for many subsequent years maintained only a commercial connection with Rome, was made part of the Roman Empire by the successors of Augustus Cæsar about a century after Julius Cæsar's invasion—so far, at least, as the lines of forts carried from the Clyde to the Forth. Even farther north there were Roman towns. . . . It seems to me we should include Southern Britain (i.e., below the Clyde and Forth) in the Roman Empire, and take as its boundary-line in Europe the Rivers Rhine and Danube in the general sense." Thus Dr. Tregelles does not include Ireland or Scotland north of the rivers Clyde and Forth—but only Southern Britain below those rivers—in the Roman Empire, which he of course maintains is to be divided into exactly Ten Kingdoms—five in the East and five in the West—at the Final Crisis.

In 1849 B. W. Newton published his able book, "Prospects of the Ten Kingdoms," in which he said:

"The two legs of Daniel's image (Dan. 2: 32, 33), corresponding with the division of the Roman Empire into its two eastern and western divisions, lead us to expect that five kingdoms of the Ten Kingdoms, prefigured by the ten toes of the image, will ultimately be found in the eastern and five in the western part of the Roman dominions.

"The prophecy about the four horns in the eighth chapter of Daniel (verses 22, 23) places it beyond a doubt that Greece, Egypt, Syria, and Thrace, with Bithynia, the four horn kingdoms, will form four of the five eastern kingdoms. And there seems little doubt but that France, Spain, and England will continue separate kingdoms to the end, and be three of the ten.

"With respect to the dissolution of unions at present subsisting between countries, one of which did, and the other did not, fall within the limits of the Roman Empire, there is the case where a country external to the Roman Empire is subjected to a country inside the Roman Empire. The countries thus circumstanced are Ireland in its relation to England, and the colonies of England, France, Spain, and Portugal; also the central part of Hungary and Bohemia, and all German Austria north of the Danube in relation to Austria.

"I think there can be little doubt but that the union between such countries will be dissolved, if not fully, yet to the extent of distinct and separate legislatures being granted, as, indeed, is already done in the leading colonies of England (e.g., Australia, Canada, New Zealand). The separation of Hanover from England, in 1830, may be regarded as an example of this."

The writer remarked in his book, "Forty Coming Wonders," published in 1866, on page 58, as follows:

"The coming predestined European Congress will be closely associated with the growing development of exactly ten kingdoms within the whole extent of the old Roman Empire, as predicted by the ten horns of the wild beast, and the ten toes of the prophetic image in the second of Daniel, where the two iron legs of that image are universally admitted to mean the eastern and western halves of the Roman Empire, which was bisected into an Eastern Empire and a Western Empire in the reign of Valentinian and Valens; and the five toes on each foot show that each half is to be divided toward the close of the history of the image into five kingdoms.

"In order, then, that the Ten Kingdoms may be completely formed, there is every reason to expect:

"That Great Britian will have the legislative union dissolved between it and Ireland, which is outside the Roman Empire, and which, therefore, must become governmentally separate from England. The Fenian organization, which is a far more serious matter than shallow journalists imagine, has discovered and developed a state of feeling which shows what inflammable elements are at hand for a Celtic revolution. Whether this separation can be effected without scenes of bloodshed and massacre remains to be seen. All the colonies included at present within the British Empire, such as India, Australia, New Zealand, the Cape of Good Hope, Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, the West Indies, etc., will entirely cease to be part of the British Empire, on account of their being outside the limits of the old Roman earth; and they will be numbered among the Last Great Napoleon's tributary dependencies, in accordance with the prophecy, 'Power shall be given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations' (Rev. 13: 7). Great political troubles may, therefore, be looked for to arise soon throughout the length and breadth of Britain's dominions."

INFIDELITY OR THE BIBLE.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, Preached on Sunday Morning, November 21, 1880.

HAVE you any nervous anxiety about the overthrow of Christianity? Oh! no. There never were so many churches of Jesus Christ as there are now, never so many men who believe in the Gospel of the Son of God, never so many institutions of mercy born of Christianity. Have you any fear that people will be laughed out of their religion, and that the modern mode of caricaturing Christianity will destroy it from the hearts of men? Oh! no. A man's religion is a very sacred thing, and it is down in the depths of his soul; and while you may persuade him out of it, or coax him out of it, or argue him out of it, you cannot laugh him out of it.

Last winter, after a celebrated assault had been made upon Christianity in New York City, some Christians seemed terrified; but on the following Sabbath we received into this church four hundred people on confession of faith in Jesus Christ, and all the churches went on. I was this week in Boston, and at the place where the most famous infidel church was ever gathered. Music Hall stands just where it did, but the infidel church has perished. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but God's word shall never pass away." What is that scrolled, clasped, Dore-illustrated volume on the drawing-room centre-table? What is that defaced, leadpencilled volume on the clerk's desk in the court-room? What is that volume put by loving hands into the trunk of the young man as he leaves country life for city life? What is that book on which all the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States and all our Presidents take their oaths of office? What is that book of which the world thinks so much that the printing press has multiplied two hundred and fifty million copies? It is the book upon which modern infidelity has its hand, and says, "Surrender!"

I. Now, I have read all these books on modern infidelity, and I have sifted them, and I have classified them, and I have analyzed them, and all the complaints made against this Bible you may put under four heads:

The Bible is an impure book, the Bible is a cruel book, the Bible is a contradictory book, the Bible is an unscientific book.

1. To prove that the Bible is

it's enemies read certain portions of the Bible and say, "Now, that is not fit for the eye or the ear of the domestic circle." They take Solomon's song, read certain portions, make their own interpretation, and then fling down the book and say, "the Scriptures are a polluted collection of writings." My friends, there is one principle that no one will deny, and that is that an impure book has impure results. That cause produces that result. Now, you have known a great many people who read the Bible, among your own friends—a great many—who have been reading it for years. How many of them have had their morals despoiled? Did it make your father an impure man? Did it make your mother a bad woman? What effect had it upon your sister who died in the faith of the Gospel and who has been now some ten or fifteen years in heaven? Were their morals tarnished? Did they become impure of speech, impure of action!

Two hundred and fifty million copies of an impure book scattered among the nations! Why, there must have been a great many victims. Show me a thousand, show me five hundred, show me a hundred, show me fifty, show me five, show me two, show me one. I am not particular about the specimen you give me, whether man, woman, child, white, black, copper-colored, American, African, European, Asiatic. Just one specimen give me—a man who was pure before made impure by the reading of the Scriptures. I am not confining you to this day. Go through all the four thousand years that have passed, and show me a victim. On the contrary, you know that the family institution is nowhere regarded except in Bible-reading countries. You know that the only foundation of the home institution is the Word of God. What is the difference between Sodom, Constantinople, Madras, Peking on the one hand, and our American cities on the other? No difference except Bible and no Bible. I challenge all earth and hell for one victim of the two hundred and fifty million copies of what you say is an impure book! The charge falls flat in the presence of every honest man.

2. Modern infidelity goes on and says the Bible is and it's enemies read the stories of the ancient wars, and read passages from the lives of David and Joshua, and read about the extermination of the Canaanites, and then declare the Bible is in favor of laceration and manslaughter and massacre. Well, now, among your acquaintances who have read the Bible, have you noticed that in proportion as they became acquainted with the Scriptures and fond of the Scriptures they got cruel in their habits? Have you ever known any of them to come out and practically say, "I have been reading the Bible, and of that story about the extermination of the Canaanites and I am seized by a disposition to stab, and cut, and beat, and knock to pieces everything I can lay my hands on?" What has been the effect upon your children? As they became more and more fond of the Scriptures, have they become more and more fond of tearing off the wings of flies, and pinning grasshoppers, and robbing bird's nests?

If the Bible is a cruel book, you see that would be the direction of the result. So far from that, you know as well as I do that all the institutions of mercy—not of cruelty—but all the institutions of mercy were founded by Bible readers, Bible believers. When did this book put cruelty into the heart of George Peabody, or Miss Dix, or Florence Nightingale, or John Howard, or John Frederick Oberlin, or Abbott Lawrence? Go into a hospital. There are twenty Christian women binding up the wounds, giving the cordials kneeling by the dying pillow, and saying, "Lord Jesus, receive this poor man's spirit." Where does the cruelty of the Bible crop out in their lives? Do you find it in the gentleness of their step, or in the soft cadence of their voice, or their soothing words in the dying hour?

Oh! sirs, when you can make a rose leaf stab like a bayonet, when you can manufacture icicles out of the south wind, when you can poison the tongue with honey gotten from blossoming buckwheat, then you can find cruelty gotten out of this Bible. That charge falls flat in the presence of every honest man.

3. But the Bible, modern infidelity says, is

and they put chapter against chapter, and prophet against prophet, and apostle against apostle, and they say, "Now, if this is so, how can that be so?" Mr. Mill, who was a friend of the Bible, and who translated many parts of it, declared that he had found thirty thousand different readings of Bible passages, and he declared also that there was not one important difference, and no difference except what might be accounted for from the fact that the Bible came down from generation to generation, and was copied by many different hands, while at the same tim declare in your hearing this morning that all t Bible writers agree in the great cardinal doctri of the Bible: God good, holy, just, forgivin omnipotent. Man a lost sinner. Christ an a glorious, all-sympathetic Saviour, ready to ta the whole world to His heart. Two destinies one for believers, the other for unbelievers.

Now, those are about the four great doctrir of the Bible, and all these writers agree in the Mozart, Beethoven, Handel, or Haydn nev wrote or heard a better harmony. Besides th you are to remember that the Bible was writt by many different persons in many differe lands, and in different ages; and that th persons had no communication with each oth and that they did not know the great design the Bible, and yet, after all, the fragments their work have been gathered up from all la and all ages, and been put together, and t make a complete harmony, so pronounced the best scholars of this age.

It is as though some great cathedral were be built and a hundred workmen were to be e ployed on it, and they were in many lands, in different centuries, and these workmen no communication with each other in regard the grand design of the building; and yet their fragments of work brought together, i a perfect architectural triumph, although man who built a pillar knew nothing of man who built the dome, and the man who b the doorway knew nothing of the man who lif the arch. Yet a complete accord, a compl architecture, and a complete triumph.

4. Again, it is charged that the Bible is

UNSCIENTIFIC.

It says that there was light before the sun created. How is that possible? It intim that the sun turns around the earth when compliment is in the other direction. It sun and moon halted, when their halting w have thrown the machinery of the universe of gear. It says that water was turned into w and declares other absurdities and impossi ties. My friends, who told you that there wa unbridgable gulf between Science and Revelat You answer, "Stuart Mill, Darwin, Tyn Renan." Yes; they saw a discord betw Science and Revelation. I can give you the na of men who tell you there is perfect accord tween Science and Revelation; I could give the names of men as much higher those wh have just mentioned as Mount Washington the Himalayas are higher than the Ridge Waterworks — Herschel, Keppler, Leib Ross, Isaac Newton. Did you ever hear eral Mitchell or Dr. Doremus lecture on the mony between Science and Revelation? ence is a boy. Revelation a man. The thinks he knows more than the man, and many unanswered questions.

The great temple of nature has two orches the orchestra of Revelation and the orchest Science. The orchestra of Revelation ha musical instruments all strung, and it is r for a burst of eternal accord. Science is stringing its instruments. You will hav wait, but after a while it will be as in son those cathedrals in Germany where they ha organ at one end of the cathedral and an o at the other end, and they respond to each ot and, so it will be in the great temple of the verse: the orchestra of Revelation and orchestra of Science will respond to each o and into one wreath will be twisted the Ro Sharon and the laurel of scholarly achieven and the roar of the ocean will be the magni bass of the temple worshippers, and the itself will be found to be only the pedals great organ of which the heavens are the board.

II. Now modern infidelity has not mad its case against the Bible as being impu being cruel, as being contradictory, as bein scientific. This plaintiff, Infidelity, has made out its case against the Bible, the de ant, and I might in the court of your r move for a nonsuit, but I will not take a ge of the circumstances, and I will tell you me things why we believe this book is the right ok, and the book from God, and and infallible ok, and an indestructible book.

There are the two Testaments, the Old and e New. Take the New Testament first. hy do I adopt it? Why do I take it? hy do I believe it? Why do I receive it ith all my heart? You can trace it right t. Jerome and Eusebius in the first cen- ry, Origen in the second century, gave lists of e writers of the New Testament, that list just rresponding with our list of writers of the ew Testament, showing precisely as we have it ey had it in the third and fourth centuries. Where did they get it? From Irenæus. Where d he get it? From Polycarp. Where did Poly- rp get it? From St. John, who was a personal sociate of Jesus. The line just as clear as any- ing ever was clear. My grandfather gave a ok to my father, my father gave it to me, I ve it to my child. No difficulty in tracing that wn from generation to generation. Just as a mmunion chalice is along from one to another, e chalice filled with the wine of the sacrament; st so this New Testament was handed down m one to another, and we drink of the new ne of the kingdom.

But say some, "Suppose they did write it; ey may have been lying impostors." Ah! I ve to tell you no man ever died for a lie cheer- lly and triumphantly. These men

DIED FOR THE TRUTH.

'Well," you say, "you have got through with mall part of the Bible; how about the Old Tes- ment?" I accept the Old Testament because t prophecies described things hundreds and ousands of years ahead—minutely and accu- ely described them. Who can fore see? God y. How far can you foresee? a thousand rs? No. Not a hundred years, not five rs, not an hour. William H. Seward, one of most eminent men of his time, made a pro- cy. He said, "The South will be con- red in thirty days." The war went along r dreadful years. He said, "It will be a job t will be accomplished before breakfast." tead of that it was after midnight—four years' night. You see human prophecies amount othing. The great Frenchman declared that Napoleonic glories would go down from eration to generation. Where are those ries? All vanished.

But here are prophecies of things that oc- red hundreds and thousands of years after- d. I want you to remember that Tyre and eveh and Babylon and Jerusalem were in pomp and glory when these prophecies de- ed that they were going to be overthrown. hitecture in some of those cities that make r houses on Madison Square and Fifth enue utterly insignificant. And yet these phecies were made at that time in regard to destruction of those cities. Suppose now a should appear in our streets and say, "The t River will overflow and destroy Brooklyn, Hudson River will overflow and destroy New k, and then there will be an earthquake, and two rivers will dry up, and there will be har- s of grain—corn—raised there, and where ton Street and Broadway are there will be ure-fields."

hy, the man would be pronounced insane. these men, these prophets, stood right amid e glories of ancient times, and said they were oing to perish, and the city of Babylon was ecome desolate. All proved true. Explore place now. You cannot find a particle of tation there, and the ground blisters the feet he explorer. Thousands of years ago fore- to re, they said, should be destroyed right in midst of its pomp and power. With a wall e hundred and fifty feet high and provisions wenty years. The prophet says, "This is all g to come down, and the fishermen will dry nets where this city stands." True to-day. u should go this afternoon to its ruins you ld find fishermen drying their nets on the rocks. Turks, Tartars, and Saracens, who know nothing of the Bible, age after age fulfilling the prophecy. Go to-morrow through Chatham Street, New York, and see the fulfilment of prophecies thousands of years ago. Why is it that a Jew in New York, or Brooklyn, or St. Petersburg, or Stockholm, or Vienna, or Paris, or Canton is always distinguishable? An American goes to Europe and stays there a great while, and he loses his nationality. An Englishman comes to America and stays here a long while, and after two or three generations you do not descry the features of the Englishman. The Norwegian loses his nationality in any other country, the Swiss loses his, the Frenchman loses his, the Italian loses his. The Jew never. Why? Because this book thousands of years ago said the Jews should be scattered all the world over and separated.

The Bible foretold a great Messiah should come. It described Him, it told from what tribe He would come, from what family, at what time, and in what place. Ages passed on, and the Messiah came, corresponding exactly with the description hundreds of years before, born in the very tribe that was foretold, in the very family, at the very time, in the very place. Now, I say any honest-minded man will confess that all this prophecy must have been from God, divinely dictated, so that the prophecies you are ready to receive this morning are the Word of God.

But you see there are many things that are not in the prophecies. Suppose you found a letter of yours in an envelope with ten or fifteen lying and indecent letters, how long would you allow your honest letter to stay in that envelope? You would snatch away your letter, or you would destroy the entire envelope. And do you suppose God would allow His prophecies to be fastened up with the writings of Job and Deuteronomy and the Book of Psalms and other parts of the Bible not belonging to the prophecies if they were bad things, if they were lying impositions? The fact that God allows all the other parts of the Old Testament to go side by side with the prophecies proves a great deal to every fair-minded man. God would not allow His fair daughter of prophecy to be affianced to this brigand of falsehood.

Now you accept the Old Testament and you accept the New Testament. What will you do with them?

WILL YOU SURRENDER THEM?

I want you to bear in mind that the most of this Bible was written by illiterate men, uneducated men. Where did they get their power? Why when Thomas Babbington Macaulay stood up in the British Parliament and wanted to finish a great sentence, or when he sat in his study writing on the "History of England," and wanted to finish a great sentence—why was it he quoted from the fishermen of Galilee? Why is it that those fishermen have more power than all the scholars of antiquity? They were divinely inspired. Besides that, you are to remember that this Bible has been under fire age after age, and yet it has not been damaged, nor has it lost one chapter, nor one verse. After all the bombardment of centuries they have not knocked a piece out of it as big as the small end of a sharp needle.

Oh! how the book sticks together. Unsanctified geologists laid hold of the book of Genesis. They were going to pull that out. The Book of Genesis is there still. Unsanctified astronomers laid hold the Book of Joshua because it seemed to interfere with some of their theories—the moon over Agelon standing still. Unsanctified anatomists and physiologists tried to pull the Book of Jonah away, and to harpoon that whale, but the Book of Jonah stands to day, the very best illustration of the fact that when God tells a man to go to Nineveh he cannot get to Tarshish, that he will be upset, if necessary. God will send a cyclone upon the Mediterranean. Men have tried to pull away the miracles of Christ. How many have they pulled out?

They have taken absolutely nothing! Here is a perfect Bible. It seems that instead of destroying the Bible the chapters have been driven in and clenched on the other side by the hammers of eternity. The fact is that the book, so far from being destroyed, is going on until the fires of the last day, and when the fires of the last day are kindled, they will not find a bundle of loose letters utterly consumed, but a compact book; and when the fires begin to burn on one side, they will burn from Genesis toward Revelation; then the other fires will burn from Revelation toward Genesis, and they will in all their course not find one chapter or one verse out of place.

That will be the only time the world can afford to do without the Bible. What use, then, of Genesis with its description of the making of the world which is all destroyed. What use, then, of the prophecies? All fulfilled. What use, then, of the evangelistic and Pauline description of Jesus Christ when we see Him face to face. What use of the photograph when we have Him in glory? What use of the Book of Revelation when we stand with our foot on the glassy sea, and our hand on the ringing harp, our forehead chapleted with eternal coronation? amid the amethystine and twelve-gated glory of heaven, the emerald dashing its green against the beryl, the beryl dashing its blue against the sapphire, the sapphire throwing its light on the jacinthe, the iacinthe dashing its fire against the crysoprasus, and we standing amid the chorus of ten thousand sunsets!

Ah! my friends, that is just the time we will be able to do without the Bible, and yet I think they will have

THE OLD BOOK IN HEAVEN.

I do not think the last copy will be destroyed. I think they will have it in heaven. It is good enough to be there. The Lamb's Book of Life on the top of it, the Book of Judgment under it. Oh! yes. We cannot spare it then, after all. I want to hear some of these passages read in heaven after we have gathered up our dead children—I want to hear these passages read, and I want to point them out, the passages that comforted us on the day of interment. We meet our friends in heaven. I want to talk over the trials of this life, and say, "Ah, those were the promises that cheered us."

I want to hear David with his own voice read, "The Lord is my shepherd." I want in heaven to hear Paul read with his own voice, "Thanks be unto God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." I want to hear the archangel play Paul's grand march of the resurrection with the same trumpet with which he woke the dead. Oh! blessed Book! Good enough for earth, good enough for heaven. When I have no griefs to be solaced, when I have no sins to be pardoned, when I have no hope of heaven to be enkindled—that will be the day, and that the hour, and that the minute, I will give up the Bible. Blessed Book! Book of life, Book of comfort, Book of God, Book bespattered with the blood of the martyrs who died in its defence. Book sprinkled with the tears of a Christian ministry who were comforted by its promises. (A voice—"Bless the Lord!") Dear old Book! Put it in the possession of every one of your children on their birthday. Have it on the stand, the centre-table of the parlor.

"Where shall I go?" said a dying Hindoo to the Brahmin priest to whom he had given his money to have his soul saved. "Where shall I go after I die," asked the dying Hindoo. "Well," said the Brahminic priest, "you will go into a holy quadruped." "But where shall I go after that?" said the dying Hindoo. "Well" said the Brahminic priest, "then you will go into a bird." "But," said the dying Hindoo, "where shall I go then?" "Then you will go into a beautiful flower." Then the dying Hindoo threw up his arms and said, "But where shall I go last of all?" This glorious Bible answers the Hindoo's question, answers my question, answers your question—not where shall I go to-day? not where shall I go to-morrow? or where shall I go next year? but where shall I go last of all?

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

Orlando Stanley Makes a Proposal—Salome Refuses to Entertain it—An Alternative—Miss Calvert's Intervention—Orlando's Decision—A Trying Ordeal At Eglinton Terrace—The Lodgings at Rochester.

It is of no use to be sentimental," Orlando said; "to me it is a matter of shillings and pence. I will admit that I have in my time tried the whole round of pleasures, and they have mostly palled upon me. Two or three things, however, still interest, amuse, and enliven me; give me the means of their gratification, and you will render me as comfortable as it is in your power to do."

"Drink is one, I suppose?" questioned Salome, and a shade of bitterness crossed her sweet face.

"Wine is one," he replied; "in fact, every doctor I know says I must die without wine. I take it for granted this lady is in your confidence?" he continued, looking first at Miss Calvert and then at Salome.

"She is," answered his wife.

"Then I will feel free to propose to you at once what you shall do for me; and on my side I give you my word not to interfere with you again."

Neither Miss Calvert nor Salome spoke, and he went on—

"Give me a hundred a year, Salome; that is all I ask, and I will not trouble you to look on me again."

His complete indifference to her womanly charms, the graces of mind and person that had held Cecil Anerley so completely captive, could not be agreeable to any wife, to any woman. It touched her pride as well as that old affection for him which she had striven in the last hour to rekindle to something of its former fervor. It was terrible to her to know and to realize so absolutely that between them there was no sympathy, no true union. She could hardly tell whether she would do most rightly to follow his own suggestion, and let him go entirely away from her, giving him enough to live upon, or to hold to her own quickly-formed plan, which had commended itself to her conscience as the right and the true one.

He would use the money she gave him wildly, recklessly; he would drink himself to death; and then she would be free—and her heart gave a wild throb, half pain, half pleasure. But no; this soul was, if possible, to be rescued from the destruction it sought and even coveted, and she, his wife, was the proper person to endeavor to rescue him.

"You require a nurse as well as a doctor, Orlando," she said. "If I were to do as you propose, you would but end your miserable life most hopelessly. No, I at once decline to accede to your proposal. I now give you the chance of agreeing to mine; and these are the only ones I shall propose: I will either go with you to an hydropathic establishment, where you will be under the care of doctor and nurses and treated as you require, or I will go into quiet private lodgings with you in the country away from London, where you may recover health and strength. I cannot ask you to accompany me to Mrs. Anerley's, where I have lived so long; it would not suit her to take an invalid into her house, but I feel sure Miss Calvert will allow you to remain here for a couple of nights, and by Tuesday or Wednesday I will have made my arrangements sufficiently to leave London with you for Rochester, where I know we could have the kind of apartments we should require. Our old nurse," she added, turning to Miss Calvert, "who took care of myself and brother when we were children, has a very comfortable house; and I know her rooms are vacant, for I heard from her a day or two ago, and she asked me if I could recommend any one to her. Either of these plans I will carry out; but for your own sake, Orlando, I must utterly refuse to allow you an income, for, unless I am with you, I know, and you know, it will not be spent aright."

"I have no fancy whatever for your constant espionage, my dear Salome," he said sarcastically.

"And I have none for your extravagance, Orlando," returned Salome, trying to speak playfully, but feeling all the while ashamed and mortified at the cold rebuff.

Miss Calvert had not intended to interfere by word or action, but she could not remain silent any longer.

"Sir," she said, "I must suppose your bringing up has been that of a gentleman, since you are so intimately acquainted with and so nearly related to this lady, but I must beg that while you are with her, and she is kindly proposing such a course of action on her own part as may be most for your advantage and as involves considerable self-denial, you will at least not insult her by treating her kind care of you as something beneath the dignity of wifehood and womanhood. A man who regards a pure and true-hearted wife as a spy must know he has good reason to be ashamed of his actions."

"I am down in the world, madam," replied Orlando Stanley with a nonchalant air, "or you would not dream of speaking to me in that style. I am well accustomed to this kind of treatment, and it long ago ceased to surprise me. You know I am in your power, Salome; I have absolutely no money, and I have no strength to earn any. But I won't go to be doctored with cold water like a rabid teetotaler; of two evils I will choose the less—Rochester and the old nurse's lodgings."

So Salome wrote at once to engage them for three months. Then she left her husband in the care of Miss Calvert and Cecil, who both promised to watch over him during her absence, and returned to Eglinton Terrace, to reveal to Mrs. Anerley and Emily the events of the morning, and to inform them of her future movements. She found, as she had expected, that they were not yet returned from chapel, and she was glad of a few quiet minutes to collect her agitated thoughts, and to take a quiet leave of the home where she had spent so many peaceful, even happy hours.

The place was haunted by Cecil's love for her. She had put off as long as had been possible its spoken revelation to herself, but she had not been able to be blind to the countless proofs of it he had so long ago begun to manifest. Men or women would be little worth if they did not feel a certain amount of tenderness for any one in whom they have awakened an honest love, which from whatever cause they are unable to return. Salome did not flinch from her noble determination to serve to the uttermost her unworthy, dissipated husband because she recalled Cecil's devotion to herself and the tender, delicate proofs he had so continually given of it. "Poor Cecil! I have deeply wronged him, terribly wronged him, I fear, by my deception. Can he ever forgive me? Can I ever forgive myself?" The key turned in the house-door, and Mrs. Anerley and her daughter entered.

"You here, dear Salome," said Emily affectionately. "But what is the matter; are you ill?"

"I have a great deal to tell you," she replied; "will you please give me a hearing?"

Mrs. Anerley sat down in her easy-chair; Emmie drew Salome to the sofa, and, having laid aside her own bonnet and jacket, threw her arm lovingly round the waist of her friend.

"However I begin," said Salome, "I am afraid my news will seem disagreeable and abrupt, and you will think, as I myself think now, that I have acted very wrongly. While still very young I married my cousin, Orlando Stanley, who was then, I fear, unfortunately for himself and for me, of very wild and dissipated habits. My father, though he did not know of our marriage, knew that he professed an attachment to me, and therefore guarded my money so carefully that it could not by any means fall into his hands."

Mrs. Anerley had put up her hands aghast, as if she would ward off the miserable intel gence.

"This is the mystery then," she exclaimed Salome's first pause. "My instinct told there was something very painful in connecti with your history, and you must allow me say, before you proceed any further, Mrs. Sta ley, that I consider you have most grossly, mo shamefully deceived us."

The tone of indignation in which the la uttered the name "Mrs. Stanley" cut Salo to the heart.

"Oh, mamma, dear!" cried Emmie, in most loving, gentle tones, "do hear Salo through before you judge her, and don't c her 'Mrs. Stanley;' still call her Salome."

Here at least was comfort to "the hea that knew its own bitterness. Emily Aner was of that faithful temperament that, once w as a friend, she would prove herself a friend f ever. Something of the old Scotch fealty t chieftain was in her attachment to Salome; acknowledged her to be cleverer, handsomer th herself, and rejoiced in the fact. She n would trust her, however dark appearanc might seem to look against her. The clo pressure of the arm that encircled her streng ened Salome to continue and to encounter M Anerley's very natural and very just disappro tion.

"To-day at the free breakfast my husba presented himself—"

Mrs. Anerley gave an impatient little scre of very evident annoyance.

"Not for a breakfast?" queried Emil "you don't mean that, Salome?"

"Indeed I do. He is sunk so low as that."

"Did you see him—did you speak to him queried Emmie.

Salome was very glad of the questions th helped her to tell the tale more easily. She lated all, and ended by repeating the propos she had made to her husband, and what he h decided upon.

"Then you give yourself up to be the c stant associate and companion of this man?" questioned Mrs. Anerley.

"It is my duty to try to save him. Do y not think so, dear Mrs. Anerley?" Salo asked, in a trembling voice.

"Then why did you not stay with him and to save him from the first, instead of lett him sink so low, and you coming to us in a fa light, and bringing trouble upon an innoce good-hearted young man," said Cecil's moth unable to forget her son's disappointment, feeling a little pardonable satisfaction in hav an explanation with the woman whom she h felt to be very blameworthy ever since she fused Cecil's hand and heart.

"I could not stay with him, Mrs. Anerle he did not let me know where he was."

"He rejected you, abandoned you almost i mediately?"

"He did." It was most humiliating of all tell this truth; but at least she would be op now and frankly confess it.

"How could he, you being so beautiful, accomplished? Oh, Salome, your husba ought to have been so proud of you!" s Emmie. "Why ever could he have married y to treat you so shamefully?"

"He thought to have had my money."

"You will leave us altogether now, I su pose?" said Mrs. Anerley.

The alteration in her tone was very pain to Salome Stanley.

"I should like to keep my things here three months and to retain my rooms, if you allow me."

"I can't have that man coming here."

"Certainly not. I should perhaps want come here once or twice during that interval consult my solicitor; I would not trouble y at all else."

"Mamma does not mean it," cried Emm "Dear Salome, it will always be pleasant to to see you at No. 12. What will Consta say?"

The following Wednesday Orlando Stanley and Salome proceeded to Rochester.

By the Rev. Horatius Bonar, D.D.

The Night Coming—The Signs of Christ's Advent Notable and Numerous—The Millennium not a Sign—1. Wars, Earthquakes, Pestilence, and Famines—2. The Restlessness of the World—3. Missionary Exertions—4. The Position of Israel—5. Disbelief in the Church—6. Human Efforts at Self-Regeneration—7. The Spirit of Knowledge—8. The Maturity of Papal Antichrist—9. The Diffusion of Infidelity—10. The Increase of Immorality—11. Increase of Superficiality and Formalism.

THE night cometh! Nor does it seem far off. It never appeared so nigh. The shadows are lengthening out, and falling with ominous gloom upon the valleys of earth. The dimness of twilight is beginning to make itself felt. It is settling down drearily upon our cities, and on our solitudes; upon the towers of our strength, and the palaces of our pomp; nor can the noisy rush of eager multitudes, hurrying to and fro for gain or pleasure, wholly stifle the utterance of fear and awe.

Yet it is written also, "The day is at hand!" The night, though dark, will be brief, and will be soon succeeded by a glorious day. But still of that day the night will be the forerunner. And this world's night is surely near.

The signs of Christ's Second Advent that have been given us both by the Lord and His apostles are both notable and numerous. And it is very evident that those have been selected which were the most expressive and least ambiguous. They are chosen as being the most prominent and explicit that could be given. It cannot be thought that the least striking have been announced and the most striking concealed.

If so, then is it not very remarkable that the Millennium of a thousand years is never mentioned as a sign at all? Had this been to take place before the Second Advent, how has it never been alluded to as one of the many signs? It would have been by far the most distinct and visible. No one could overlook or mistake it. Yet nowhere, by prophets or apostles, or by the Lord Himself, is it noted as a sign. How can this be accounted for, save upon the ground that it was to take place after, not before, the Advent? If this be omitted, all is plain; if it be denied, then let those who deny it account for the fact that, among the many signs of the Advent, the Millennium is never mentioned as one. How the most palpable of them all could be omitted seems to me to require an explanation. On the post-millennial system, the omission seems to me inexplicable. For thus our Lord would be made to profess to tell us the signs of His appearing, and yet to conceal the most notable of them all.

But this is not all. The signs which are given are inconsistent with the idea of a Millennium before the Second Advent. Who that reads the Lord's prophecy in Matthew 24, which begins with the destruction of Jerusalem and ends with His second appearing in the clouds of heaven, does not feel that the whole drift of it was to show the Church that they were to expect sorrow, not joy, tribulation, not triumph, up till the time when He should return? These signs were the successive crests of the billows on which she was to be tossed, till He, with His own voice and presence, should rebuke and calm the ocean.

Let me now note some of the signs which, in the present day, seem most remarkable as forerunners of the Lord's appearing. And though of some of these it might be said that they have been found in former days, yet others of them, as we shall see, are peculiar to our own.

1. Wars and rumors of wars, earthquakes, pestilences, and famines in divers places (Mat. 24 : 6, 7). I need not enter minutely into the proof of the existence of these. The public journals bear witness to it. For a while it seemed almost as if the world were at rest, as if its storms had spent themselves. But now all seems changed. Every day brings new indications of

DISQUIETUDE AND CONVULSION.

Few nations seem willing to draw the sword, yet every nation has her hand upon the hilt; with some it is already gleaming in the air, and with others it is reddened with blood. Over the whole earth is heard "the long, low, distant murmur of dread sound." And is this not the prelude to the LAST UNIVERSAL WAR? (Ezek. 38; Zech. 14; Dan. 11 : 40–45; 12 : 1; Rev. 13 : 7; 16 : 12–16; 17 : 8–14, 19 : 11–14). Is it not a sign of the near approach of Him who, when earth's madness and ambition are at their height—when the summoned nations are gathered at Armageddon, girt for battle and slaughter—Himself appears for their discomfiture and ruin? Then, but not till then, wars shall cease, and the weapons of war perish.

2. THE RESTLESSNESS OF THE WORLD.

This sign is in part connected with the preceding, yet may be viewed separately. The state of the world is at present very ominous. "Distress of nations with perplexity—men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things that are coming on the earth," "and then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud (Luke 21 : 25–27), is God's picture of the state of men as the final crisis draws on. This certainly seems our attitude at this moment. The earth, and the things that are coming on it, attract the attention of all serious thinkers. There is something in the state of the world so unsettled, so pregnant with uncertain evil, that every eye is moving to and fro in expectation of strange issues, and as if to catch the first sign of their approach. The time for listlessness and apathy is gone.

SOME THIRTY YEARS AGO, when the skies were bright, and men could promise themselves days of sunshine, it was safe enough to fold the hands and take our ease. But all this is over. No doubt, after the excitement of recent wars and revolutions, men would prefer repose. But the onward swell of the waters stays not for an hour. There is among the nations a spirit of restlessness, anarchy, and insubordination, a passionate love of change, a headlong rush to overturn every established system, too furious and united to be ultimately withstood. Many call it but a passing tumult, the frenzy of an hour; but they who understand it know how deep is the spring out of which it flows. The storm, long gathering, but resisted and repressed by the barriers which ancient wisdom had erected for the stability of kingdoms, is concentrating and condensing its strength in these venerable recesses, which may for a while refuse to yield to the explosive force. but which, overstrained at length, give way to the accumulated pressure; then will the kingdoms of the earth be shivered; throne and temple overturned; wall and fortress laid in ruins. Such is the night which is to precede the long-looked-for day—when not only Israel but the whole earth shall arise and put on the garments of beauty, fit and meet for the personal presence of their glorious King.

3. Home and Foreign MISSIONARY EXERTIONS.

No age since that of the apostles has witnessed such widespread exertions in behalf of the Jewish and Gentile nations as our own. This certainly is a sign peculiar to the present century. I do not speak of Missionary and Bible Societies as if they were to convert the world; but still I would point to the fact of hundreds of missionaries going forth to every region of our globe, millions of Bibles circulated—almost every nation having the Scriptures in their own language—and pointing to these simple but magnificent facts, I ask, Is there not in these a most palpable fulfilment of the words of the Lord, "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached to all nations for a witness, and then shall the end come?" (Matt. 24 : 14). In our day we have the preaching of the Gospel, and its witness-bearing most manifest.

The result is not the conversion of the world, but the gathering out of the election (Acts 15 : 14). And then the End comes! It is not said, And then the Millennium comes; but the End—the end of this present age, and the Coming of the Son of Man. This sign seems also referred to in Revelation (14 : 6), "I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel, to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to Him, for the hour of His judgment is come." This sign will, I doubt not, become more and more visible—but still there it is already before us—a sign which foretells a coming Lord, and most distinctly intimates the impossibility of a Millennium before His Advent.

4. THE POSITION OF ISRAEL.

This long-forgotten nation is now coming into remembrance. The nations of the earth are beginning to observe this strange people, 'terrible from the beginning hitherto.' The eyes both of the world and of the Church are far more intently directed toward them than they have been since the day that their city perished, and they were led captive into the land of the stranger. It is curious to observe how both travellers and missionaries are continually making new discoveries with regard to Israel, stumbling upon some new fragment of their lost ten tribes.

A GOODLY NUMBER OF JEWS

are also turning their eyes to the Cross of Christ. The "remnant according to the election of grace" is visibly coming in. The interest taken in the Jews everywhere is very striking. God is once more placing them before the eyes of the world, as those through whom he has blessed the world in times past, and through whom He means to bless it again. But when is this? Not till "the Redeemer shall come to Zion, and turn away ungodliness from Jacob." Not till "they shall look on Him whom they have pierced, and mourn." The full salvation of Israel is reserved for the coming of their Messiah. Then, but not till then, shall "Israel blossom and bud, and fill the face of the world with fruit." (Rom. 11 : 5, 26; Zech. 12 : 10).[*]

5. DISBELIEF OF THE APPROACHING ADVENT of Christ, even in the Church. It is no marvel that the world should either deride or deny that event. And it is of the world's mocking that Peter speaks when he says, "There shall come in the last days scoffers, saying, Where is the promise of His coming?" But the Church also loses sight of that day; nay, refuses to credit the news of its approach. She says, "My Lord delayeth His coming." She slumbers and sleeps. And it is just when she is speaking thus, and thus slumbering, it is in an hour when she thinks not, that He arrives. It is often said, Surely, if the time were just at hand, more of God's people would believe it. But it is when many of them are not believing it, and counting on delay, that the Bridegroom comes.[†] While then we mourn that so many of the saints should disbelieve the nearness of that day, let us also lift up our heads, for by this sign we know that our redemption draweth nigh (2 Peter 3 : 3, 4; Matt. 24 : 48).

[*] Scripture plainly predicts tthe future restoration of the Jewish nation to Palestine—first, partially in an unconverted state from political motives (Ezekiel 38, 39; Daniel 9 : 27; Jeremiah 30 : 3–7; Zechariah 14 : 1–4; Isaiah 66 : 3–6, 17); secondly, their universal conversion and restoration after the brief period of "Jacob's trouble." (Ezekiel 40, 48; Zechariah 2, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14; Isaiah 65, 66, etc.)

[†] Now, how can this be the case if the Millennium precede the Advent? Will the Church not know when the thousand years are done? (Rev. 20.) Would it be possible for her then to say, "My Lord delayeth His coming?"

CURRENT EVENTS.

Strong Expressions of Discontent come from Democrats in all districts of the country with reference to the management of the campaign in New York. Now that it is evident Gen. Hancock lost the election through the lack of support it was expected he would command in this State, searching inquiries are being instituted as to the causes which operated against him. Among other charges, it is openly asserted that ballots proved to have come from the Tammany organization were fraudulently bunched, the Garfield presidential ticket being inserted among the local Democratic ballots. This it is alleged was not a mistake, but the result of an arrangement to carry the local ticket at the expense of the presidential candidate. The word treachery is freely applied to the Tammany chief, and his conduct at the election for governor, which gave the State into Republican hands last year, is again freely commented upon. Mr. Kelly is now the most unpopular man in the Democratic party, but the powerful organization he controls appears from a recent vote still to place confidence in him.

The Effort of Postmaster-General Maynard to close the liquor stores opposite his department in Washington has failed, much to the disappointment of the friends of temperance in the city. The commissioners have granted the licenses against which Mr. Maynard protested, and claim that President Hayes sanctioned their action, though that statement is doubted by those who know the President's decided views on temperance questions. The Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune says:

"There are eight of these liquor shops opposite the Post-Office Department, and five around the Interior Department, making thirteen for the accommodation of the clerks in these two adjacent buildings. On one square opposite Government property, and within sight of the State, War, and Navy Departments, and only one block and a half from the White House itself, there are twelve of the worst resorts of the kind in the city, besides four gambling houses in which liquors are sold. These, as well as the scores of others about Government property, could all be driven from such public places if the President accepted the interpretation put upon the law by the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney of the District, who is regarded as one of the best lawyers in the Washington Bar. The gambling dens are in full blast day and night and Sundays. In these respects there has not been as bad a condition of affairs in the Capital since the times of the war."

The Construction of Gen. Garfield's Cabinet is the problem on which politicians are just now exercising their minds. The President-elect has, however, spent so much of his life in the political arena that the advice so freely offered him on the subject will probably have but little weight. The question may, however, be an embarrassing one unless Gen. Garfield has sufficient strength of mind to shake himself clear of entangling alliances. There is no doubt that he owed his nomination at Chicago mainly to the good-will of Secretary Sherman and Senator Blaine, who, finding their own prospects gloomy, preferred Gen. Garfield to Gen. Grant. But he as clearly owes his election to the State of New York, and that State was won for him mainly by the exertions of Gen. Grant and his able lieutenant, Senator Conkling. Thus three sections of the Republican party may consider they have claims upon him in the distribution of patronage, and Gen. Garfield must be singularly adroit if he succeeds in satisfying more than one of the three.

The position Mr. Sherman now occupies is the one about which most curiosity is expressed, and a strong effort is being made by business men to induce Gen. Garfield to offer him the same position in the new cabinet. There is no doubt that under exceptionably favorable circumstances Mr. Sherman has shown a capacity for making the best use of them in the interests of the people, and the national finances have prospered under his management. But Mr. Sherman is opposed by the Grant wing of the party, and therefore attention is concentrated on that appointment, which is expected to indicate the extent of influence the different sections of the party exercise on the President-elect.

The Death of Rev. Charles S. Brown, for a long time associated in the management of the Five Points Mission, New York, occurred at Nyack-on-the-Hudson on November 14th. He was fifty-five years of age. He was born in the State of New York, and after receiving a liberal education entered the Wesleyan University at Middletown. At the conclusion of his college course he undertook various missions through the country, and showed himself possessed of considerable executive capacity and earnest Christian activity. Five years ago it was proposed to put him in charge of the Five Points Mission, and the suggestion was at once adopted. Mr. Brown was eminently adapted for the position, and his services there received general recognition. Four weeks ago he contracted malaria, and, although he was thought likely to recover, he sank rapidly during the last few days of his life. His death will be sincerely mourned by many of the poverty-stricken people about Five Points, among whom he labored and who appreciated his kindly cheerful manner as well as the value of the truths he taught. The decided improvement which of late years has been perceptible in that locality once the by-word for all that was degraded and criminal, has been to a large extent due to his indefatigable exertions.

The Proposed Production of the Passion Play in New York is condemned by the secular press as well as by eminent ministers of all denominations, and even by the Jewish rabbis of the city. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., says of it: "I think the play will not succeed. It failed in San Francisco, and it ought to fail here. If, however, the people have reached such a depth of infidel degradation that they desire such a play, they will have it, for the supply always equals the demand. It's of no use for Mr. Abbey to talk about charity: that is only a bribe. I don't know of any charitable institution that would receive the devil's money. There is a religious conviction down deep in the breast of every person, gained in childhood, that will come up at times, no matter if it seems to be lost. Any attempt to travesty or represent the life of our Lord upon the stage will arouse that religious spirit, and cause the people to look upon the Passion Play with horror." Dr. Ormiston says: "It outrages all my ideas of the sacredness attaching to our Lor and Saviour. As for devoting the proceeds t charitable purposes, that shows they know th have got poison, and they want to sugar it over. Dr. Taylor, of the Broadway Tabernacle, says "I consider the Passion Play in a theatre th nearest approach to blasphemy that I know of. The Rev. William Lloyd says: "It is an insu for the man who produces Cinderella to lay h hands on the story of Christ." Dr. Newma says: "I would as soon think of representin Almighty God upon the stage as His Son Jesu Christ."

The Times, Tribune; Sun, and other daily p pers have condemned the production of the pla and the Herald says almost exactly what we hav quoted from Dr. Tyng.

A Shocking Fire Occurred at St. Peter, Min on the night of November 15th, which from t character of its circumstances was of a peculiar distressing nature. The large lunatic asylum, i which 656 afflicted persons were confined, w partially destroyed in a few hours. The fi broke out in the north wing of the building, an while some of the attendants exerted themselv to extinguish it, others endeavored to extrica the patients. The latter work was one of e treme difficulty, for the poor creatures could n in many cases be made to comprehend their da ger, but jabbered among themselves with app rent delight at the spectacle, as if the affair we something especially ordered for their entertai ment. Many of them refused to leave the buil ing at all. The others were saved, some b ladders and some by leaping from the window

Some were nearly nude, some shoeless an hatless, and all were exposed to the exceedin cold of the night. Many of the poor dement and crazed inmates fled as if for their lives, an could not be overtaken or confined. After th had escaped the flames they were at large ha clothed, and were to be seen in all directio flying in wild fright from those who attempt to save them. The poor creatures, were hi ing in alleys and dark corners for some tim Thirteen bodies of those who perished in t flames have been found. Ten more are believe from what is known of them, to have be burned, and eight others are missing. A de snow was on the ground, and it is feared th many of those rescued from the flames will d from the effects of the cold.

An Act of Inhuman Barbarity Committed R cently in Missouri shows that men whose hear have not been regenerated by the grace of G are capable, when moved by anger, covetousnes or any other potent occupant of the spirit, deeds positively fiendish in their cruelty. Th owners of two adjoining farms quarrelled abo a strip of land only six inches wide, which ea claimed as part of his property. They met lat ly on this contested plot, and one of them o dered the other to stand off it. As the ord was not obeyed he deliberately chopped off o of his neighbor's feet with an axe. An American Monastery has been Estab-ished in Boston, Mass. The Boston correspondent of a New York journal says: "The Church of the Advent, on Bowdoin Street, could ıot do enough in the way of high ritualistic and Romanistic formalism, but must have a Monkery. The men take upon themselves vows of poverty, elibacy, and seclusion, each one surrendering is property of whatever kind, and all dwelling ogether in a house or houses of their own, and oing their own housework, no woman ever beng admitted within their doors. They profess he utmost simplicity in furniture, dress, table, tc., in order to have more money for charitable ses. How they get money at all short of begng does not appear, for there is no intimation f their doing anything to earn it. They have et times for meals, for reading, meditation, sacaments, self-examination, and sleep." This is step to the rear. Those who leave the practial duties of Christian life for such a "retreat" o not advance the cause of Christ in their own ouls nor in the world.

A Remarkable Answer to Prayer was Re-ted at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting last eek. A missionary said he had fresh reasons r thankfulness to God. A few days since he as seeking to help a family who were in sore raits. The mission with which he was concted, and which he hoped might supply the ants of this tried family, he found could not so, as there was an immediate need of one ındred dollars. The twofold need was laid fore the Lord, and in a most unexpected way lp was secured for the family. Later in the y the missionary met a business man, who id: "I do not know that I can quite afford but I have been impressed to make out a check your mission for one hundred dollars. Here is." The day dawned with clouded sky, but eventide there was light.

The Astonishment of an AlaskaIndian Boy entering the school for Indian children which ss Austen superintends in connection with the esbyterian mission had a practical effect which netimes fails to follow teaching in the pulpit l elsewhere. Miss Austen says some of the ldren come to school with only a blanket, and hirt made out of salt bags; but when the exple is set them of neatness they seem anxious follow it. Connected with the school are two sh-rooms, and the children are encouraged l exhorted to make good use of clean water. The first day they commenced washing, one of boys did not come in till quite late. He med perfectly astonished to see the chiln looking so clean and nice. Finally he exmed, 'Excuse me. I guess I go and wash .' He did so, and seemed highly gratified h the result." Dr. Sheldon, in his new book Alaska, speaks encouragingly of mission rk in the Territory, and expresses his belief t it is one of the most hopeful fields for istian labor in the world.

he Rev. E. M. Sasseville, of the Hedding sion Church, Rochester, N. Y., gave his congation an account of his conversion from the rch of Rome on Sunday evening, November . He was a wood engraver in Montreal, and faith in Roman Catholicism was first shaken is acquaintance with a priest of depraved racter, and afterward through witnessing the rder of Hackett in an Orange riot in July, . About that time discussions had arisen veen a Methodist young lady working in office with Mr. Sasseville and one of the ng men, a Roman Catholic. "In these," Mr. Sasseville, "the young man was alys worsted, for the reason that the lady always ted the Scriptures, which he could not an. I had never seen a Bible, so that I knew ing of the Scriptures. On my one day reking this, the lady gave me her Bible and d me to read it, if for no other reason, as a ory. I took it home and put it in my k. About 8.30 P.M. on the 12th of July I n my room thinking of the events of the and wishing that I could find some means lighten myself in regard to religion, when I suddenly thought of the Bible in my trunk. I took it out, and opening at the New Testament began to read. How beautiful I found it! how attractive and simple! but so sublime, so grand and clear! I read until two o'clock, and had perused the four Gospels and part of the Acts. I found nothing there of the doctrines I had been taught, no cardinals, no purgatory, no pope, and I made up my mind that the Church of Rome was not the Church of Christ. I was down-hearted and saddened, for I knew not which way to turn, and kneeling down I prayed that I might find the Saviour, and that I might be assured that I was forgiven. Suddenly I felt the burden lifted from my shoulders. My heart was filled with joy, and I knew that my prayer was answered."

A Thief Conscience-Stricken.—An Incident which occurred on a farm in Connecticut, related by The Youth's Companion, illustrates the proverb that the wicked flee when no man pursueth (Prov. 28 : 1). A farmer who suffered from petty pilfering suspected one of his neighbors. He watched his barn, and saw, one night, a man coming out with a large bundle of hay on his back. Instead of meeting the man face to face, and charging him with the crime, the farmer rushed into his house, where a wood-fire was still burning. Seizing a blazing brand, he noiselessly overtook the thief, and thrust the brand into the hay and retired.

In a minute or two the thief was suddenly startled by the crackling flames bursting over his head. Thinking the fire had been sent from heaven to consume him, he dropped the bundle and ran home almost paralyzed with fright. The next day he sought the farmer. With great distress of mind he confessed all his petty pilferings, and avowed his purpose to live an honest life. The farmer forgave him, and never told the story until after the death of the penitent thief—who faithfully adhered to his resolution.

An Emigrant's Sudden Death Occurred at Castle Garden a few days ago. A young Norwegian with his wife and children resolved on attempting to improve his position by emigrating to the new world. But his wife was reluctant to leave her aged widowed mother who would have been friendless in her old age had her daughter left her. The old lady knew of the circumstances, and rather than filial love should injure the prospects of those she loved, she offered to accompany them to their new home. It was a hard trial for her to leave the scenes of her youth and to sever old associations, but she bore it apparently with fortitude. The discomforts of the voyage did not appear to distress her, but when she landed, and sitting on a trunk on the dock, surveyed the strange scene of bustle and bewildering confusion, her spirit failed her; her head sunk on her breast and she passed away to begin her new life in a new world—not this, but that where her Father has many mansions for those who love Him.

The Portrait and Life of the New Lord Mayor of London will appear in the next number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Alderman W. McArthur, M.P., who was elected to that dignified and responsible position on November 9th, is, like the newly-elected Mayor of New York, an Irishman by birth, but, unlike him, he is an earnest and vigorous Protestant. He belongs to the Wesleyan Methodist denomination, and his father was an eminent Wesleyan minister. The new lord mayor has been a very successful business man, but he has found time in the midst of commercial pursuits to work for the advancement of many schemes for the promotion of religion and philanthropy. In many cases, too, where he was unable to give personal labor to a cause in which he sympathized, he has contributed munificently from his private funds. It is a singular and gratifying coincidence that in the year when the great Œcumenical Council of the Wesleyan Methodist Church is to assemble in London the chief magistrate of the city should be a conspicuous member of that church.

MASCHIL OF ETHAN—A MAJESTIC SONG.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations. For I have said, Mercy shall be built up for ever: thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens."—PSALM 89 : 1, 2.

Singing as a Relief to Sorrow—I. The Eternal Builder—A Stately Edifice in Ruins—Futile Attempts to Rebuild it—The Original Builder Rebuilds it with Mercy—Real Work—A Fixed Thing—An Orderly Thing—A Stately Pile—Self-righteous Boasters of Perfection in Danger—Looking Forward—The Work to go on Forever—It Will never Decay nor Fall Down—II. An Everlasting Singer—The Subject of his Song—Unscriptural Metaphors of Eternal Torment—The Song Instructive—The Christian's Work Eternal.

THIS psalm is one of the very choicest songs in the night. Midst a stream of troubled thoughts there stands a fair island of rescue and redemption, which supplies standing-room for wonder and worship; while the music of the words, like the murmuring of a river, sounds sweetly in our ears. Read the psalm carefully and it will rouse your sympathy, for he who wrote it was bearing bitter reproach, and was almost broken-hearted by the grievous calamities of his nation. Yet his faith was strong in the faithfulness of God, and so he sang of the stability of the Divine covenant when the outlook of circumstances was dark and cheerless.

Nor did he ever sing more sweetly than he sang in that night of his sorrow. Greatly doth it glorify God for us to sing His high praises in storms of adversity and on beds of affliction. It magnifies His mercy if we can bless and adore Him when He takes as well as when He gives. It is good that out of the very mouth of the burning fiery furnace there should come a yet more burning note of grateful praise. I am told that there is a great deal of relief to sorrow in complaining; that the utterance of our murmurs may sometimes tend to relieve our pain or sorrow.

But, methinks, the best relief for sorrow is to sing; this man tried it, at any rate. When mercy seems to have departed, it is well to sing of departed mercy. When no present blessing appears, it is a present blessing to remember the blessing of the years gone by, and to rehearse the praises of God for all His former mercies toward us. Two sorts of songs we ought to keep up, even if the present appears to yield us no theme for sonnets: the song of the past for what God has done, and the song of the future for the grace we have not tasted yet—the covenant blessings held in the pierced hand, safe and sure against the time to come.

I invite your attention to two things. First, we shall look at the work of the eternal builder—"Mercy shall be built up for ever;" then, secondly, we shall listen to the resolve of an everlasting singer—"I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever."

I take the second verse first: it is needful for the handling of our subject. You know, in the Book of Common Prayer the rubric prescribes concerning a certain form of words that it is "to be said or sung." We will do both. The first part we will have is the verse which begins "I have said;" and then the second part shall be the verse which begins "I will sing." It shall be said and sung too. God grant we may say it in the depth of our heart, and afterward that our mouth may sing it, and make it known unto all generations. May the Spirit of all grace fill us with His own power.

I. First, then, let us contemplate

THE ETERNAL BUILDER, AND HIS WONDERFUL WORK.

"I have said, Mercy shall be built up for ever: thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens."

I can see a vast mass of ruins. Heaps upon heaps they lie around me. A stately edifice has tottered to the ground. Some terrible disaster has occurred. There it lies—cornice, pillar, pinnacle, everything of ornament and of utility broken, scattered, dislocated. The world is strewn with the débris. Journey where you will, the desolation is before your eyes. Who has done this? Who has cast down this temple? What hand has ruined this magnificent structure? Manhood, manhood it is which has been destroyed, and Sin was the agent that effected the Fall. It is man broken by his sin. Iniquity has done it. O thou devastator, what destructions hast thou wrought in the earth! What desolation thou hast made unto the ends of the world! Everywhere is ruin; everywhere is ruin.

Futile attempts are made to rebuild this temple upon its own heap, and the Babel towers arise out of the rubbish and abide for a season, but they are soon broken down, and the mountain of decay and corruption becomes even more hopeless of restoration. All that man has done with his greatest effort is but to make a huger display of his total failure to recover his position, to realize his ostentatious plans, or to restore his own fleeting memories of better things. They may build, and they may pile up stone upon stone, and cement them together with untempered mortar, but their rude structure shall all crumble to the dust again, for the first ruin will be perpetuated even to the last. So must it be, for sin destroys all. I am vexed in my spirit and sore troubled as I look at these ruins, fit habitations for the bittern and the dragon, the mole and the bat. Alas for manhood that it should be thus fallen and destroyed!

But what else do I see? I behold the great original Builder coming forth from the ivory palaces to undo this mischief; and He cometh not with implements of destruction, that He may cast down and destroy every vestige, but I see Him advancing with plummet and line, that He may rear, set up, and establish on a sure foundation a noble pile that shall not crumble with time, but endure throughout all ages. He cometh forth with mercy. So "I said," as I saw the vision, "Mercy shall be built up for ever."

There was no material but mercy with which a temple could be constructed among men. What can meet the guilt of human crimes but mercy? What can redress the misery occasioned by wanton transgression but mercy? Mere kindness could not do it. Power alone—even Omnipotence—could not accomplish it. Wisdom could not even commence until Mercy stood at her right hand. But when I saw Mercy interpose I understood the meaning. Something was to be done that would change the dreary picture that made my heart to groan, for at the advent of Mercy the walls would soon rise, until the roof ascended high and the palace received within its renovated glory the sublime architect who reared it.

When Mercy came—God's darling, for He saith He delighteth in mercy—then was there hope that the ruins of the Fall would no longer be the perpetual misery of men. I said, "Mercy shall be built up." Now, if you closely scan the passage you will clearly perceive that the psalmist has the idea of God's mercy being manifest in building, because a great breach has to be repaired, and the ruins of mankind are to be restored. As for building, it is a very substantial operation. A building is something which is palpable and tangible to our senses. We may have plans and schemes which are only visionary, but when it comes to building, as those know who have to build, there is something real being done, something more than surveying the ground and drawing the model.

And oh, what real work God has done for men? What real work in the gift of His dear Son! The product of His infinite purpose now becomes evident. He is working out His great designs after the counsel of His own will. What real work there is in the regeneration of His people. That is no fiction. Mercy is built, and the blessings that you and I have received have not mocked us; they have not been the dream of fanatics, nor the fancy of enthusiasts. God has done real work for you and for me, as we can bear testimony, and as we do bear testimony at this hour. "For I have said, Mercy shall be built." That is no sham, no dream: it is the act and deed of God. Mercy has been built.

A thing that is built is a fixed thing. It exists—exists really, and exists according to a substantial plan. It is presumed to be permanent. True, all earthly structures will moulder and decay, and man's buildings will dissolve in the last great fire, but still a building is more durable than a tent, or a run-up lodge in a garden of cucumbers, and "I have said, Mercy shall be built."

It is not a movable berth, but a fixed habitation—I have found it so. And have not you? God's mercy began with some of you—no, I must not talk about when it began, but I mean you began to perceive it many years ago now, when these heads that are now bald or gray had locks bushy and black as a raven—when you were curly-headed boys and girls, that clambered on your father's knee. You remember, even then, the mercy of your God, and it has continued with you—a fixed, substantial, real thing. Not the old house at home has been more fixed than the mercy of God. There has been a warm place for you by the fireside from your childhood until now, and a mother's love has not failed; but more substantial than a house has been the mercy of God to you. You can indorse the declaration of David: "I have said, Mercy shall be built."

A building is an orderly thing as well as a fixed thing. There is a scheme and design about it. Mercy shall be built. God has gone about blessing us with designs that only His own infinite perfections could have completed. We have not seen the design yet in the full proportion. We shall be lost in wonder, love, and praise when we see it all carried out; but we perceive already some lines, some distinct traces of a grand design, and I said, as I caught first one thought of God, and then another, of his mercy toward me,

"MERCY SHALL BE BUILT."

I see that it shall. This is no load of bricks shot out. It is polished stones builded one upon another.

But now He says, "Mercy shall be built up." Will you try to think for a minute upon these words—"built up?" It is not merely a long, low wall of mercy that is formed, to make an inclosure or to define a boundary, but it is a magnificent pile of mercy, whose lofty heights shall draw admiring gaze, that is being built up. God puts mercy on the top of mercy, and He gives us one favor that we may be ready to receive another.

Would that I had a vivid imagination, and a tongue gifted with eloquence; then I would try to portray the twelve courses of the new Jerusalem, and show how the stones of fair colors came one next to the other, so that the colors set each other off, and blended into a wondrous harmony; but I can clearly see that the mercy of the azure shall not come first, but there shall be the mercy of the emerald to underlie it, and there shall be an advance made in the preciousness of the stones with which God shall build us up, and we cannot tell what the next is to be; certainly not what the next after that is to be, nor the next after that, and the one to follow after that. But as I saw half a dozen of the courses of God's mercy, I said, "His mercy shall be built up."

Its foundations were laid low. In great mercy he gave me a broken heart. That was pure mercy, for God accepts broken hearts; they are very precious in His sight; but it was a higher mercy when He gave me a new heart, which was bound up and united in His fear and filled with His joy. Oh, brethren, let us remember how He showed us the evil of sin, and caused us to feel a sense of shame. That was a choice mercy, but it was a clearer mercy when He gave us a sense of pardon.

Oh, it was a blessed day when he gave us th little faith that tremblingly touched His garment's hem. It was better when He gave u faith as a grain of mustard seed that grew. I has been better still when by faith we have bee able to do many mighty works for Him. W do not know what we shall do yet when He give us more faith. Far less can we imagine ho our powers shall develop in heaven, where fait will come to its full perfection. It will not die as some idly pretend. There we shall implicit believe in God. We do not know what any on of our graces may be built up into, but if yo are conscious of any growth in any grace, yo have learned enough to appreciate the orac that speaketh in this wise—"I have said, Merc shall be built up for ever."

Once again would I read this verse with ver great emphasis, and ask you to notice how it rebukes the proud and the haughty, and how it encourages the meek and lowly in spirit. "I hav said, Mercy shall be built up for ever." In th edification of the saints there is nothing else bu mercy. Some people seem to fancy that whe we get to a certain point in grace we do not nee to sue for mercy.

My dear friends, if any of you get into tha humor that you say, "I need not make any confession of sin, I need not ask pardon of sin,' you are trifling with the very truths of whic you seem to be tenacious. I do not care wha doctrine it is that brings you there; you are in dangerous state if you stop there.

GET AWAY BACK DIRECTLY.

Your right position is at the throne of grac and a throne of grace is meant for people tha want grace, and you need grace now; neve more than now. Without mercies new eve morning, as the manna that fed the Israelite of old, your days will be full of misery.

Your Lord and Master taught you to say no only "Our Father which art in heaven," an "Thy kingdom come," but he bade you constantly to pray, "Forgive us our trespasses a we forgive them that trespass against us." " have no trespasses," says one. Tut, brothe go home, and look at your own heart. I wi have no argument with you. Take the bandag off your eyes. You are about as full of sin as a egg is full of meat. Among the rest of you many sins there is this rotten egg of an accurse pride as to your own state of heart. I said, wha ever you say, "Mercy shall be built up forever.

I expect God to deal with me on the footin of mercy, as long as I live. I do not expect th He shall build me up in any way but accordin to His grace, and pity, and forgiving love. there be any creatures in this world that ca boast of having got beyond the need of askin for mercy, I have not learned their secret self-deception. I do know of some professo who climb so high up the ladder that they co down the other side. I fancy that is very muc like the wonderful growing in perfection which they prate. It means full often going u so high that they are pure saints in their ow esteem, but anon they have gone down so lo that they are poor lost sheep in the estimatio of the churches of Christ. God grant you ma not fall by any such process.

There will not come a point when the angel masons shall stop and say, "Now then, the ne course is to be merit. So far mercy: now th next course is to be perfection in the flesh; th next course is to be no need of mercy." N no, mercy, mercy, mercy, till the very topsto shall be brought forth with shoutings of "grac grace unto it." "Mercy shall be built up."

Yet onward glance your eye. "I said, Mer shall be built up for ever." For ever? Well, have been peering back into the past, and I di cover that nothing else but mercy can accou for my being or my well-being. By the grace God I am what I am. The psalm of my lif though filled with varied stanzas, has but o chorus, His mercy endureth for ever. Will yo look back, beloved, on all the building of yo life and character? Any of it that has been re building—gold and silver and precious stones-has all been mercy, and so the building will go on.

The operation is proceeding slowly but surely. What though at this present hour you may be in grievous trouble? Mercy is being built up for you. "Oh, no," say you, "I am tottering, and my days are declining, and I feel I shall be utterly cast down." Yes, you may be very conscious of your own weakness and infirmity; but the mercy of the Lord is steadfast, its foundation abides firm; not a single stone can be moved from its setting. The work is going on, storm or tempest notwithstanding. There is nothing precarious about the fact that mercy shall be built up for ever.

Let not the murky atmosphere that surrounds you blind your eyes—the eyes of your understanding—to this glorious word—"forever." Rather say, if I am well set in this fabric of mercy my castings down are often the way in which God builds up His mercy. I shall be built up forever. And oh! if it goes on being built up forever—I am ravished with the thought, though I cannot give expression to it—what will it grow to? What will it grow to?

If it is going to be built up in the case of any one of you, say seventy years, oh, it will be a grand pinnacle, an everlasting monument to the Eternal Builder's praise: but you see it will go on; it will be built up forever. What! never cease? No, never. But shall it never come to a pause? No, mercy shall be built up for ever; it shall go on towering upward. Do you imagine that it will go at a slower rate by and by? That is not likely. It is not God's way: He generally hastens His speed as He ripens His purposes. So I suspect that He will go on building up His mercy tier on tier, height on height, forever.

Says one, "Will its colossal altitude pierce the clouds, and rise above the clear azure of the sky?" It will. Read the text: "Thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens." Within the bounds of my feeble vision I can discern that it has risen above death, above sin, above fear, above all danger; it has risen above the terrors of the judgment day; it has outsoared the "wreck of matter and the crash of worlds:" it towers above all our thoughts.

Yes, and what is once built up will never fall down, neither in whole nor in part. There is the mercy of it. God is such a Builder that He finishes what He begins, and what He accomplishes is forever. "The gifts and calling of God are without repentance." He does not do and undo; or build for His people after a covenant fashion, and then cast down again because the counsel of His heart has changed. So let us sing and praise and bless the name of the Lord. I do hope that, from what little our experience has taught us already, we are prepared to cry, like the psalmist, "I have said, Mercy shall be built up forever: thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens."

II. Well, now, we come back to the first verse. There are first that shall be last, and last that shall be first, so is it with our text. We have looked at the Eternal Builder, let us now listen to

AN EVERLASTING SINGER.

"I will sing of the mercies of the Lord forever: with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations."

Here is a good and godly resolution: "I will sing." The singing of the heart is intended, and the singing of the voice is expressed, for he mentions his mouth; and equally true is it that the singing of his pen is implied, since the psalms that he wrote were for others to sing in generations that should follow. He says, "I will sing." I do not know what else he could do. There is God building in mercy. We cannot assist Him in that. We have no mercy to contribute, and what is built is to be all of mercy. We cannot impart anything to the great temple which He is building; yet we can sit down and sing.

It seems delightful that there should be no sound of hammer or noise of axe; that there should be no other sound than the voice of song, as when they fabled of the ancient player upon the instruments that He builded temples by the force of song. So shall God build up His church, and so shall He build us as living stones into the sacred structure, and so shall we sit and muse on His mercy till the music breaks from our tongue, and we rise to our feet and stand and sing about it. I will sing of the mercy while the mercy is being built up. "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord."

But will he not soon sink these sweet notes and relapse into silence? No; he says, "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord forever." Will he not grow weary and wish for some other occupation? No; for true praise is a thirsty thing, and when it drinks from a golden chalice it soon empties it, and yearns for deeper draughts with strong desire. It could drink up Jordan at a draught. This singing praise to God is a spiritual passion. The saved soul delights itself in the Lord, and sings on, and on, and on unwearily. "I will sing forever," saith he. Not, "I will get others to perform, and then I will retire from the service;" but rather, "I will myself sing: my own tongue shall take the solo, whoever may refuse to join in the chorus."

Now note his subject. "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord." What, not of anything else? Are the mercies of the Lord his exclusive theme? "Arma virumque cano"—"Arms and the man, I sing," says the Latin poet. "Mercies and my God, I sing," says the Hebrew seer. "I will sing of mercies," says the devout Christian. This is the fount of mercy, whereof if a man doth drink he shall sing far better than he that drinketh of the Castalian fount, and on Parnassus begins to tune his harp.

"Praise the mount, oh, fix me on it, Mount of God's unchanging love."

Here we are taught a melodious sonnet, "sung by flaming tongues above." "I will sing of mercies, I will sing of mercies forever," he says, and I suppose the reason is because God's mercies would be built up forever.

What a spectacle it will be as you sit in heaven, and watch God building up His mercies forever, or, if it may be, to wander over all the worlds that God has made: for I suppose we may do that, and yet still have heaven for our home.

HEAVEN IS EVERYWHERE, to the heart that lives in God. What a wonderful sight it will be to see God going on building up His mercy. Ah, we have not acquired an idea of the grandeur of the plan of mercy. The grandeur of His justice no thought can conceive, no words can paint.

Ah, my dear brethren, although there have been expressions and metaphors used about the wrath to come which cannot be found in Scripture, and are not to be justified, yet I am persuaded that there is no exaggeration possible of the inviolability of God's law, of the truthfulness of His threatenings, of the terror of His indignation, or of the holiness of Jehovah, a holiness that shall constrain universal homage; but you must always take care that you balance all your thoughts. In the retributions of His wrath there shall be a revelation of His righteousness: for no sentence of His majesty will ever cast a shadow over His mercy, and every enemy will be speechless before the equity of His award. They that hate Him shall hide their faces from Him; in burning shame they shall depart to perpetual banishment from His presence. Their condemnation will not dim the purity of His attributes.

The glory of the redeemed will also reveal the righteousness of Jehovah, and His saints will be perfectly satisfied when they are conformed to His likeness. On the summit of the eternal hill you shall sit down and survey that mercy-city now in course of construction builded up; it lieth four square, its height is the same as its breadth, ever towering, ever widening, ever coming to that divine completion which, nevertheless, it has, in another sense, already attained. We know that God in His mercy shall be all in all. "I will sing of the mercy of the Lord forever," for I shall see His mercy built up forever.

This singing of Ethan was intended to be instructive. How large a class did He want to teach? He intended to make known God's mercy to

ALL GENERATIONS.

Dear, dear, if a man teaches one generation, is not that enough? Modern thought does not adventure beyond the tithe of a century, and it gets tame and tasteless before half that tiny span of sensationalism has given it time to evaporate. But the echoes of truth are not so transient; they endure, and by means of the printing press we can teach generation after generation, leaving books behind us as this good man has bequeathed this psalm, which is teaching us perhaps more largely than it taught any generation nearer to him.

Ethan said, "God's mercy shall be built up forever," and he is teaching us still that blessed fact. Suppose you cannot write, and your influence is very narrow, yet still you shall go on singing of God's praise forever, and you shall go on teaching generations yet to come. You Sunday-school teachers, you shall be Sunday-school teachers forever. "Oh!" say you, "no, I cannot credit that." Well, but you shall. You know it will always be Sunday when you get to heaven. There will never be any other day there, but one everlasting Sabbath; and through you and by you shall be made known to angels, and principalities, and powers, the manifold wisdom of God.

I teach some of you now, and I often think you could better teach me, some of you old experienced saints. You will teach me by and by. When we are in glory we shall all of us be able to tell one another something of God's mercy. Your view of it, you know, differs from mine, and mine from my brother's. You, my dear friend, see mercy from one point; and your wife, even though she be one with you, sees it from another point, and detects another sparkle of it which your eye has never caught. So shall we barter and exchange our knowledge in heaven, and trade together and grow richer in our knowledge of God there. "I have said, mercy shall be built up forever: thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens." Then I said, "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord forever: with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations."

We never can stop it; we never can cease; but as the heavens are telling the glory of God, and every star declares in wondrous diversity His praise, so where the stars differ from one another in the glory of God above, the saints shall be forever telling the story which yet shall remain untold—the love we knew, but which surpassed our knowledge; the grace of which we drank, but yet was deeper than our draughts; the bounty in which we swam until we seemed to lose ourselves in love: the favor which still was greater than our utmost conceptions, and rose above our most eager desires.

God bless you, brethren and sisters, and send you away singing—

"All that remains for me
Is but to love and sing,
And wait until the angels come,
To bear me to my King."

By a London Clergyman.

SQUIRE ARMITAGE.

CHAPTER II.

I HAVE said that Squire Armitage was a man of his word. And in his expressed resolve to stem the tide of intemperance in his own village, he did not let the grass grow under his feet, but set to work at once. The remedies proposed at his own dinner table he kept full in view. He erected new dwellings where they were needed. He provided entertainments of all kinds for the villagers' amusement. He improved the school. He instituted classes for older men on certain evenings in the week. He got down lecturers to elevate the tastes of the people. He also provided a room where the men of the village might read, smoke, and talk.

Of course all this took time. But time, pains, and money were quite ungrudged for the object he had at heart. At length the time came when Squire Armitage could look quietly about him and notice whether things were prospering or no. He fully expected thorough and complete success—moderate drinking the order of the day, and excess quite stamped out.

Now if I were to say he met with no success at all I should be guilty of an untruth. He did much good. But if, on the other hand, I were to say he had shown the uselessness of total abstinence, or the inadvisability of it, I should be saying what was equally untrue. To show how matters stand, I will just lay before you an incident or two.

The Squire was riding home from the hunt one night when he met, a little outside the village, one of his tenants. He recognzied him at once as being one of the very men for whom he had built a new dwelling. The man had taken just enough to remove his rustic shyness, but not too much to prevent his making himself understood. Staggering before the Squire's horse, he touched his hat, and said,

"Squire, you've a giv'd me a good 'ouse. I tell 'e what I want now. Will 'e give me a new wife?"

In a moment it flashed across Squire Armitage's mind that here was a case his remedy could never touch. This man had a drunken wife. What availed a new house with a brawling intemperate woman in it? A good house was one thing, but was it all that was needed? He had acted as though it were only the men who needed reclaiming. He had quite overlooked the drunken wives.

"I'll speak to you, my man," said he, "when you are sober," and rode on with a heavy heart.

A few weeks after this he attended one of the people's entertainments. He made it a point always to take the chair. After the people had dispersed, he stayed for about an hour behind, making some arrangements for the next that was to be held. It happened that his way home lay past the public-house of the place. Long before he reached it he heard shouting and singing proceeding from it. But when he came up to it, it dawned upon his mind that drunkenness was as rampant as ever. It seemed to him as though he had only dammed back the current for a very short season, and that it was rolling on all the more fiercely for its temporary arrest. He felt curious to know what the men were saying, and so reined his horse somewhat nearer the window. He heard his own name mentioned.

"Squire Armitage—let's drink to 'un," shouted one intoxicated voice; "the friend of the working-man and his beer."

"They're getting drunk with my name on their filthy lips," the Squire groaned out; and then he rode rapidly home with a very heavy load upon his heart

One of the most humbling things, however, which the Squire experienced was in connection with one of the lecturers. One evening, when this lecturer stood up to speak, he had somehow lost his accustomed freedom of speech. He jumbled up his facts together, too, in a most odd way. Never before had his memory proved so treacherous. And it was observed, moreover, that he was obliged to support himself by resting his hand upon the back of a chair. Squire Armitage thought it all very strange; but the truth never dawned upon his mind until one small boy from the back seats exclaimed, "Why, master, you're drunk!"

Oh the bitter shame and humiliation the Squire felt that evening! Here was an educated man, brought down for the express purpose of enlarging the minds of the rustics, and so to cure them of their drunken habits, and himself drunk. At once dismissing the assembly, and without speaking to any one, he went straight to his house. That night's lesson had dealt his cherished opinions a terrible blow, from which they never really recovered.

The next morning it was told him that some of the audience had led the tipsy lecturer into the public-house, and had made him dead drunk, after having amused themselves with him to their hearts' content.

I might relate many more incidents of the same kind. Scarcely a day passed but that something or other occurred to diminish his hopes of his plans really succeeding. And were it not for one argument, which was constantly in his mind, he would have despaired long ago.

"My son George is a reclaimed man," he would say to himself; "there can be no doubt of that. I have noticed a wonderful difference in him for months past. He never gets drunk or stays out at night now. His mind is decidedly clearer; and he helps me now as he never did before. Yet he drinks in moderation. I wonder I never thought of asking him how he managed to overcome his temptation. I am afraid I have not taken him sufficiently into my confidence. I am in such sad despair about the whole thing that whatever plan George adopts for himself I will adopt for the people."

Another dinner party at Squire Armitage's, and as cosey a one as before. The very same guests, and the very same subject: "Drunkenness, and how to cure it." The Squire had invited them specially to state how their plans had been tried, and how they had failed. This he did in a very few words, and in a very sad, despondent tone.

"I am not a man to give up very easily, you all know; but I must frankly confess that I am thoroughly beaten in this matter."

After fidgeting nervously for a moment or two with his wineglass, he looked toward his son George and said,

"By the way, George, what is your mind on the subject? You have been giving it some thought, I know. Come, let us hear."

A feeling of surprise passed through every mind at these words of the Squire. George had the character among them all for liking a glass too much; and to hear, as they now did, that George had been thinking of the drink question in any other way than to intoxicate himself, might well startle them.

Now George had been prepared for this by his sister, so he was not at all taken by surprise.

"Well, father," he replied, "as you have asked me, I will freely tell you all I know. You have tried many remedies on your people. I have tried one on myself. You have failed; I have succeeded. My remedy is a very simple one, and it has succeeded with me when everything else has failed. And I feel, father, very strongly, that if you could persuade your people to drink nothing stronger than what I have in my glass, you would cut the drink evil to the very root. I have cured myself by taking nothing stronger than this." So saying he held up his glass to the view of all.

Calling to the servant to fill every glass in the room with George's beverage, the Squire added,

"Gentlemen, we will try this famous vintage of George's. But, first, I would say that I have fully determined to act up to my son's suggestion, whatever it may be."

Squire Armitage, having given the word, every glass was lifted to the lip and sipped. Any painter of real life, who is desirous of a study of faces with unusual and strange expressions upon them, should seek out some such scene as was now presented to the eye at Squire Armitage's table. From the host downward, blank astonishment was depicted on every countenance.

"What is it, George?" stammered out his father.

"Toast and water, father," replied the son.

"For goodness' sake, explain, and be quick about it. We don't understand it at all."

"Friends and neighbors, I will explain. The fact of the matter is, I have given up strong drink altogether. I'm a teetotaller. I have found nothing in the world besides to answer in my intemperance. It was all my sister's doing. She persuaded me to give up the strong drink, and I thank God I did so. I am a different man altogether from what I was, and I am not ashamed to say it. I was once almost a drunkard, and altogether without God in the world.

"It was through seeking the strength of God against my besetting sin, that I was led to see my need of a Saviour from all sin. I am trusting in Him now, and I hope to trust in Him to the end. I found it utterly impossible to drink a little without also drinking much. Had I gone on trying to drink in moderation, I firmly believe that at this moment I should have been a confirmed drunkard. Father, you owe a son whom you can honor and respect, through the grace of God, to this one simple remedy of total abstinence."

I wonder whether the teetotallers of the village had pleasant dreams that night, and whether the drunkards tossed uneasily and painfully in their slumber. They certainly would have done, could they have heard Squire Armitage's next words:

"Gentlemen, I am convinced. My son George is right, and I have been all in the wrong. Henceforth I change my plans completely. I will go in for total abstinence myself, and strive to get my people to do so likewise."

If any body of temperance advocates had hard up-hill work, it was those who labored in Squire Armitage's village. To win a convert to their cause had been for some time an almost impossible thing. They were just able to keep their ground, and that was all. The Squire's frown would, in fact, have quite annihilated them in time. It was with very sad and despairing feelings that they gathered together for their monthly meetings in neighbor Foot's best room.

It was the Monday night after the events just related that the few temperance folks of the village came together to talk over the sad state of affairs in the place, and to propose, if possible, some cure for it. It was plain, however, before five minutes had passed, that none had a word to say in the direction of hope. Despairing remarks, though, were very abundant.

They had not time to say very much when the door was thrown wide open, and who should stalk in, whip in hand, but Squire Armitage. To say that the good folks were in a fright would be to put it very mildly. They could scarcely speak for amazement. Neighbor Foot expected nothing less than notice to quit at the legal time, and prepared for the worst. The rest scarcely knew what to expect. Very soon he set their fears at rest by saying, "My friends, forgive me," and shaking them all round by the hand.

"I've come to join you—to be one with you," he said. "I've tried my way and failed, and now I am going to try yours."

He said a great deal more, but as this was the refrain of it all, I need not repeat it. Suffice it to say that Squire Armitage threw the whole weight of his influence into the teetotal scale, and with his son and daughter gave it such an impulse that it soon became as flourishing as before it was languishing.

For miles round Squire Armitage's name was associated with temperance; and whenever a popular man was needed at a meeting to take the chair, the Squire was sure to be the one asked.

And now I mav leave him, I think, to his good and grand work, with the hope that the story of Squire Armitage, and how he was convinced, may convince others also.

A PERPETUAL JUBILEE.

"The Spirit of the Lord God is upon me," etc.—ISAIAH 61 : 1.

PASSING on in the history—we find that the next blessing pertaining to the year of jubilee was

THE RESTORATION OF ALIENATED PROPERTY.

When a man, through misfortune or through extravagance, had contracted liabilities that were beyond his means, and had sold his possessions to discharge them, if he were not himself able to redeem them, and if none of his kindred were at once wealthy and willing, these possessions remained as the property of the creditor until the year of jubilee, and then it was provided by the law that they should return to him who had parted from them for a season.

Now as this enactment was universally known—known to begin with, as the property could only be bought and sold upon these terms—there could, of course, be no injustice to the creditor, while to the debtor every one sees it was a most merciful and considerate provision. Such is the power of association in the human mind that we cling with fond tenacity to the belongings of those we love, and cannot part from them without a pang. A faded flower coming suddenly into sight can thrill the soul of a strong man and break up his fountain of tears, just because in the long past some dear hand touched and nursed it; the hand is dust, perhaps, but the flower is a hallowed thing forever.

The books we read; the games we played; the garden in whose shrubberied walks we gambolled chainless as the butterfly we vainly strove to catch; the pictures which to our conscious hearts seemed to follow us with their eyes, and frown upon us because of some meditated wrong; the old arm-chair in which the mother sat; the river by whose banks we strayed, wondering where it went to, and what t said in that murmuring tone that ceased not day nor night—all these, and a thousand other things that we look at still with a silent heart, and through the magnifying-glass of memory—oh, how much greater hold they have than mightier things that have happened since!

Brethren, we, the whole race of us, had a right inheritance once—God's favor, God's felowship, God's image, all were ours by birth—but alas! we alienated it by sin. God's favor was turned away; God's fellowship was interupted; God's image was defaced by the Fall. We are not ourselves able to redeem it. We have no resources. We have spent our all, and n the far land of our exile we have begun lready to be in want. But, through infinite ompassion, this our inheritance has not been uffered to pass out of the family. Christ our insman, our Elder Brother, has paid down the rice, and has rescued this our heritage from he fangs of the harpies who would fain have surped it for their own. We had sold it for othing, or had spent the money of its purchase n riotous living, in our heedless avarice and leasure, or in our sordid trafficking for gold. We had sold our birthright as a common thing, ut it has been redeemed, and it is offered to us ithout a price by a love that is surely without parallel.

The acceptable year did dawn upon the world, ndeed, when it witnessed the birth of Messiah, nd that sun, like that of Gideon's day, stood still at His bidding, and has hasted not to go down until now. Christ is living yet. Oh, do not go away looking into the empty sepulchre, and saying, "They have taken away my Lord." They have, but they took Him from death to life only. Christ is living yet; it is not a dead Christ, but a living one we worship. Christ is living yet, and because He is living the atonement lives, and is influential day by day. A richer than the former inheritance has been purchased by His passion for you, for

"In Christ the tribes of Adam boast
More blessings than their father lost."

The curse need no longer rest upon you, for in Christ God's favor shines, and the light of His countenance beams bright and full upon the soul. There need no longer be upon any one of you the likeness of the evil one, for looking unto Jesus a man grows into His beauty as he gazes, and becomes like Him, because he sees Him as He is. The precious and endearing fellowship with God may be restored—nay, may become more intimate and hallowed than before, for while in the old Paradise the Lord only came into the garden in the cool of the day, in the new and blessed state of privilege all the day long He can dwell in the heart, and make it His constant and abiding home.

To be sure, there is one part of the inheritance we cannot get back again. The curse has swept away the traces of the primitive paradise. There is not a solitary floweret to mark its site; there is not a vestige of its ancient tree of life. We cannot get that again; but in its stead, what have we?

HEAVEN, THE PLACE OF MANY MANSIONS

and of bright companionship, whose eternal spring no winter ever blights, and about whose trees of life no tempting serpents twine. Brethren, this is your inheritance. Christ has purchased this inheritance for you. Have you put in your claim? Do you, think—do you hold the title deeds? Think; are you trying after a personal meetness, or, like the Israelites, are you content to forego your heritage because of the perils of the journey? Are you ready to make unholy league with the Canaanites, who have so long had it in possession? Are you content, like them, recreant hearted, to abide in the wilderness and die? I tell you all, as God's messenger, to-day, this disinheritance of yours may be reversed if you will. Christ will refuse—the essence of the Gospel offering is in this sentence that I am going to utter—Christ will refuse to enrich no man who comes to Him; Christ will force His treasures upon no man, and will compel not one solitary pilgrim to enter into joy.

III. Just another blessing which is mentioned in the history may be worthy of our notice, and that is

THE RESTORATION OF FREEDOM.

It seems to have been a custom among the Hebrews, as among other Eastern nations, for a debtor who had become hopelessly involved, to sell himself to his creditor, in order that by his personal service he might discharge the debt that he was otherwise unable to pay. Of course it was provided that for the amelioration of his condition, and for its termination in the year of jubilee, the man was not to be a slave, but a hired servant and a soldier, and he was to remain until the year of jubilee, and then he and his children should all return unto their possession.

Now this certainly must be regarded by all that are right-minded as involving a deliverance of inestimable value. Liberty! What heart is there that does not feel its pulse quicken at the sound? There are none that are insensible, surely, to this precious common right of man. All instincts beat in unison here; even the dullest kindle into rapture, and the most craven for freedom's sake would strike the unwilling blow. Of all earth's heroes we honor that one the most who fought only for liberty—who trampled upon ambition and the lust of power, and then retired when his work was done into an honorble privacy, spurning the crown, and having as his richest heritage only the blessing of the nation he had favored. Of all earth's hapless ones, we pity him the most who languishes in hopeless bondage until he has lost all note of time, and looks through the rayless eyes of idiocy upon any change that gleams through the despairs of his dungeon.

Brethren, you can readily perceive the analogy, and you have drawn it, I have no doubt, at once. Conceive the feelings of the Israelite when, after his long servitude, the day of his redemption drew nigh—when his labor which had long enriched another's treasury would go lawfully to the replenishment of his own fortune, and to the preparation for his own children; when there was no longer on his brow the brand, or in his heart the iron of the slave. Oh, that last night of his bondage would be like the night of the destruction of the first-born—a night to be much observed unto the Lord. How eagerly would he enter into the solemnities of the day of atonement! With what ecstasy would he be thrilled as he caught the first blast of the trumpet, and leaped up to welcome it in all the fulness of his unshackled soul!

Brethren, all bondsmen are not yet enfranchised.

THERE ARE BONDSMEN TO-DAY.

All sinners are represented as being in bondage, bound with the chain of their sins, servants of him whom they obey, led captive by the devil at his will. This is the state at this moment of every one of you who has not come to Christ. You are startled at that, I see, perhaps disposed to be indignant, and to exclaim, in the pride of your fancied independence, "We be Abraham's children, and we were never in bondage to any man." Ah, that is one of the cunningest secrets of your oppressor's power. He gilds the yoke, and you are not conscious that you wear it; but there are times when you feel its fretting notwithstanding. You are not free. With all your boasting you are not free.

That giant passion masters you, that besetting sin just turns you about whithersoever it listeth. You submit in unconstrained and willing obedience under the master whom you serve. Oh, how I delight to proclaim it in your hearing. "The year of jubilee is come;" the Saviour, with whom there is the fulness of the Divine Spirit without measure, "has sent me to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound." To the foullest moral dungeon this great light will pierce; to the man who has been immured the longest is proclaimed the acceptable year of the Lord. From the strongest and most frowning fortress in which tyranny can bind its captives, this Saviour can deliver, and He will. He will deliver all who come to Him.

Now, brethren, are you going to listen to

or to shut your ears to-day, refusing to hearken to the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely? There is no distinction in the sound. It is a blast of freedom to every man. But sometimes when the trumpet sounds you know it sounds to soldiers whose pulse it makes to leap quicker, as they prepare to gird themselves for the battle; and it sounds to cowards—the same blast; it does not make them cowards, but it sounds to cowards; and it sounds to traitors now and then, whom it only speeds to their treason. How shall it be with you? In which rank are you—soldiers of the Cross who fight the battle, or cowards who flee, or traitors who plot? Don't put that question away, for this is the sound of the trumpet now in the hearing of every one of you, and you will have to answer for the way in which you have received it.

I proclaim this jubilee in your hearing to-day,

"Oh for a trumpet voice
On all the world to call,
To bid their hearts rejoice
In Him who died for all."

Jesus has died for you. He is willing that you should be delivered, and that is proclaimed for you in this year of jubilee. May God save and bless you, too, for the Redeemer's sake!

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

The Diamond Ring.

I FOUND Evelyn in a different frame of mind from what she had been the night before. She was still silent, and looked unhappy, but she was very loving and affectionate to me.

"May darling," she said, as she put her arms round my neck and kissed me, "are you very angry with me?"

"Angry with you? no, indeed, Evelyn," I said; "why should I be angry?"

"Oh, I was so horrid to you last night, I know I was; I can't bear to think how nasty and disagreeable I was. How you must have hated me!"

"No, Evelyn dear," I said; "you were only tired and—"

"And what?" she said.

"And troubled, were you not, dear?" I ventred to say; "troubled about something of which I did not know, and so could not sympathize with you."

"Yes," she said, "I was very bothered and troubled, and I wanted to tell you about it so much; but I did not know whether I ought to do so."

I did not answer her, but went on quietly with my work.

After a minute or two she said in a whisper, "May, I'm not going to tell you anything, but I'm going to show you something. That won't be telling, will it? Hush! is that any one coming? No, it is no one coming; it is only Clemence going down-stairs; but, mind, if the door opens, you must look just the same as usual, and not say a word. Mind!"

She drew from her pocket a little leathern case and opened it. Inside was a beautiful diamond ring.

"Isn't it pretty?" she asked as she showed it to me.

"Very pretty," I said, "very beautiful. Did Sir William give it to you?"

"Oh, no," she said; "papa does not know anything about it, and I must not tell him. You can guess who gave it to me; I am not going to tell you, but you can guess. And then, don't you see, if you know about it, then I can wear it sometimes; it seems such a pity never to wear it. I can put it on now and then, when we are here alone, and slip it off if I hear any one coming. Don't you think so, May dear? How grave you look!" she said, in an altered voice; "what is the matter? Are you very angry with me?"

"Not angry," I said, "not angry, Evelyn; but I feel troubled about what you have told me. Why don't you tell your father about it, dear?"

"Oh, I could not," she said; "he would be so vexed, so very vexed. I dare not tell him."

"Why do you think he would be vexed?" I asked.

"Oh, because it must have cost such a great deal of money. Look, May, they are real diamonds; and Donald has so little money to spend, and papa thinks he is so very extravagant. There! I've told you who gave it to me; I did not mean to do so, but of course you had guessed before."

"I think it would be much better if you told Sir William," I said; "he might be a little vexed at first with your cousin for giving so much money for it, but I am sure he would be far more vexed if, by any means, he found out that Mr. Trafford had given it to you, and yet you had never told him of it."

"Yes," she said, "I know he would; but the worst of it is, that isn't all, May; if I told him that, I should have to tell him something else, I could not stop half way."

"But I think you ought to tell him all," I said, "and to hide nothing from him which you feel he ought to know. You would be much happier, Evelyn, if you told him."

"Yes," she said, "I know I should; but then you see I promised not to tell him, and it would never do to break my promise."

"But if you promised to do what was wrong," I said, "it can surely not be right to keep your promise."

"Do you think so, May?" she said. "I thought it was a dreadful thing to break a promise."

"Yes, so it is," I answered, "if there is nothing wrong in what we have promised; but if conscience tells us afterward that we ought never to have made the promise, and that we cannot keep it without doing what is wrong, then I feel sure that we ought to break it."

"Do you think so?" she said again.

"I am sure of it," I answered. "It is wrong to promise to do what is wrong, but to keep the promise is doubly wrong."

"I don't see that at all," she said; "I think if you promise to do anything you ought to keep your promise, whether the thing is right or wrong."

"Suppose I should promise some enemy of yours that I would poison you, Evelyn," I said; "that would be wrong, would it not?"

"Yes, very wrong," she said, laughing, though she had tears in her eyes; "what a dreadful illustration to use!"

"Never mind, it will show you what I mean. It would be very wrong of me to promise to do such a wicked thing, but it would be still worse if I kept my promise, and really did poison you; now, wouldn't it?"

"Yes," she said, "I see; of course it would!"

"Well," I answered, "I think that rule applies to all promises. It is wrong to promise to do what is not right, but it is doubly wrong to keep our promise, and to do it, because, you see, that is only adding sin to sin. The making the promise is one wrong action, and the fulfilling the promise is only adding to it another and a still worse action."

"I never thought of that before," she said; "I have been wishing ever since that I had not promised not to tell papa. You see, May, I promised Donald that afternoon, before you came in, that some day or other I would be his little wife. I know I ought not to have promised him, but he was so nice and seemed to love me so much. He said he had brought that ring with him that I might always keep it near me, and that whenever I looked at it I might think of my promise. And then he said that I must not tell papa, because he would be so very angry if he knew. I told Donald that I should be obliged to tell papa, for how could we ever be married if papa did not know about it?"

"And what did Mr. Trafford say?" I asked.

"Oh, he said there was plenty of time for that—we could not be married for many a long day, and he would tell papa himself, some day. So then he made me promise not to tell him till he gave me leave; and just then you came into the room, and we could not talk any more about it. I do wish I had never promised him."

"Yes, it was a great pity," I said; "but now I think the best thing you can do is to write to Mr. Trafford, and tell him you feel you were very wrong to make the promise, and that you feel it would be still worse to keep it."

"Do you think that would be a good plan?" she asked.

"Yes," I said, "I am sure it is what you ought to do, Evelyn."

She did not answer me at once, but sat looking into the fire and thinking. I sent up an earnest prayer that she might be led to do what was right.

Presently she looked up at me, and said, "I can't do it, May, it is no use thinking of it; I can't tell papa. Donald would be so angry; I don't think he would ever forgive me."

"Evelyn," I said, "you remember Herod's promise to give Herodias whatever she asked for; and you remember why he kept that promise, even when the keeping of it made him commit murder."

"Yes," she said; "doesn't it say it was because of his oath's sake; I suppose Herod did not like to break his word."

"And Evelyn," I said, "there is another reason given; do you remember what comes next?"

"No; what is it?" she asked.

"'And because of them which sat with him at meat.' I think that was the real reason why Herod kept his word. It was not because he minded breaking his promise—he was not the kind of man to mind that—but it was because he was afraid of what his friends might say or think; he may have thought, too, that his wife would never forgive him, and so he kept his promise, and cut off John Baptist's head—he was not brave enough to do what he knew was right."

Evelyn covered her face with her hands and cried. I sat beside her and put my arm round her, and we sat thus for some time in silence. Then she suddenly jumped up, went to the table, opened her portfolio, and began to write.

"I am going to be very brave, May," she said, as she smiled through her tears.

What Evelyn said to her cousin I do not know, but she cried a great deal while she was writing it. Then she slipped the letter into her pocket.

"It won't do to put it into the post-bag," she said; "we will get out at the post office, and post it when we drive out this afternoon, and then I will tell papa this evening, after dinner."

Oh, how thankful I was to hear her express this determination! I felt as if a great load had been lifted off my heart.

Evelyn was very pale, and trembled very much, as dinner-time drew near. She went downstairs as usual, and tried to talk to her father, and to appear as if nothing was the matter, but I could see that it was a very great effort for her to do so, and that she was dreading the time when her secret must be told. She had posted the letter to her cousin that afternoon, so it was too late to draw back; and I do not think that she wished to do so, but she dreaded her father's displeasure, and longed to feel that the trying disclosure was made.

When dinner was over we went into the library, and Sir William made Evelyn lie down on her couch, for he had noticed that she was pale and tired, and I, according to previous arrangement with Evelyn, made some excuse for leaving the room, and left her alone with her father.

I went up-stairs into Evelyn's room, and sat waiting for the result, and praying that she might have courage to tell Sir William all, and that he might not be very angry. It seemed a long time before any one came. I took up a book and tried to read, but, though my eyes followed the words, I could not fix my thoughts upon what I was reading. Then I tried to sew, but that attempt was also a failure. So I went to the window, and sat looking out at the setting sun till the room grew dark. Then Clemence, Evelyn's maid, came into the room for something, and, seeing that I was in darkness, she lighted the gas, and drew the curtains, and then once more I was left alone..

At last I heard a step on the stairs. It was Sir William, and he was coming up alone. He came into the room, and shut the door behind him, and, coming up to me, he said kindly,

"Miss Lindsay, I have to thank you for the kind way in which you have influenced Evelyn to-day. She tells me that it is entirely owing to you that she has been led to confess to me her foolish conduct."

"I am quite sure, Sir William," I said, "that Evelyn is very thankful that she has told you. She loves you so much that it was misery for her to feel she was deceiving you."

"Yes, poor child!" he said; "she has suffered a great deal these last two days. I do not blame her; of course she acted very wrongly, but the chief fault does not lie at her door." I did not answer, and he went on:

"That nephew of mine wants putting in his proper place. I hope this will be a lesson that he will never forget! I shall not spare him, I can tell you. I am afraid he is a designing fellow!

velyn does not see through him, of course, t I do; and I shall let him know it too. But need not trouble you with this, Miss Lindsay," said, as he rose to leave the room. "I just anted to thank you very much indeed for being true, wise friend to my dear child, and to tell u how I value your influence over her."

S. Lesson for Dec. 5th, Gen. 48. Golden Text, ver. 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HAVING God's assurance that it was His will should remove into the land of Egypt, and ving no further admonition to return when days of the famine should be over, Jacob ode in Egypt, and lived there seventeen years, that the whole term of his life was "a hun- ed forty and seven years." Whenever we are ected by God in an unmistakable manner to a certain thing, or to go a certain way, we ve no need to worry ourselves as to how long ts direction may last; as though God so dged His counsel that it was only an excep- n this time; that He should have made known s will, and that afterward we should have to ft for ourselves. Whatever direction we ve will last until we receive further direction; the God who has once guided us will be ur guide even unto death" (Ps. 48 : 14), if we l only yield ourselves up to His leading with fidence and obedience.

And the time drew nigh that Israel must d" Was it the accumulation of weakness and gradual loss of his powers which told him or was it that God revealed it? We are not l. In any case, the lives of these old patri- ns were not brought unexpectedly and sud- dly to a close; they had work to do at the end heir lives, and God would not cut them off il they had done it. Jacob believed in the mises of his God, which he had sought so nestly to obtain, but often in so wrong a , and he would claim by his very dust in th the fulfilment of them to his seed. Thus said unto Joseph, "If now I have found e in thy sight, put, I pray thee, thy hand er my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt: but I lie with my fathers, and thou shalt carry out of Egypt, and bury me in their burying- ple. And he said, I will do as thou hast a. And he said, Swear unto me. And he re unto him."

s far as we can gather from the narrative, b's faith, which was often so fluctuating, and nfruitful in the lands of Canaan and in Meso- mia, settled down in Egypt into a calm, im- able assurance. Can it be that Joseph's and holy life told upon his father, and that dream of rule, not merely over his brethren over his parents, was realized in his being e in some measure a spiritual guide, coun- r, and example to his father? There is ething touching in this last act of Jacob's , that his very dust should make its mute al to the God who cannot lie, and should gle with the soil of which he and his seed the heirs according to promise. It is truly rded of these early men of faith: "These ied in faith, not having received the prom- but having seen them afar off, and were uaded of them, and embraced them, and essed that they were strangers and pilgrims e earth" (Heb. 11 : 13).

And it came to pass after these things, that told Joseph, Behold thy father is sick: and ok with him his two sons, Manasseh and aim." Jacob had come into the possession blessing from the Lord, which he had the and power to transmit to his posterity; one of the riches, grandeur, or learning of t were so costly in Joseph's eyes as the ing of his father. Oh, how contrary to all is of God is that spirit which dominates young in our day, and which holds a r's counsel and a father's blessing in con- t! Here was the prime minister of the est country in the then known world, coming to receive the blessing of his old shepherd father, and teaching his sons, who were perhaps the lads most in note after the king's sons in Egypt, to covet and to esteem that blessing.

Jacob did not at first perceive the entrance of his son and his grandsons, until it was told him, and then "Israel strengthened himself and sat upon the bed." The old man had a mission to perform. "And Jacob said unto Joseph, God Almighty appeared unto me at Luz in the land of Canaan, and blessed me, and said unto me, Behold, I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make of thee a multitude of people; and will give this land to thy seed after thee for an everlasting possession. And now thy two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, which were born unto thee in the land of Egypt, before I came unto thee into Egypt, are mine; as Reuben and Simeon, they shall be mine. And thy issue, which thou begettest after them, shall be thine, and shall be called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance." Was this Jacob's own idea, or had he received it from God? There can be no doubt that the latter was the case, for in every enumeration of the tribes of Israel in the Word of God, Ephraim and Manasseh are mentioned as though they were sons of Jacob equally with his own.

Jacob, although he was often a faithless believer, had the spirit of prophecy, and God gave him to see, no doubt, what should be regarding his posterity in the future; indeed, his blessing on his sons in the following chapter is nothing more nor less than a prophecy. In 1 Chron. 5 : 1, 2, we read that because of Reuben's sin, "his birthright was given unto the sons of Joseph, the son of Israel: and the genealogy is not to be reckoned after the birthright: For Judah prevailed above his brethren, and of him came the chief ruler; but the birthright was Joseph's." Again, in Josh. 14 : 4. "The children of Joseph were two tribes, Manasseh" i.e., the double portion, which was the right of the first-born (Deut. 21 : 17)," and Ephraim: therefore they gave no part unto the Levites in the land, save cities to dwell in." God must have revealed His mind on this point to His feeble and aged servant.

"And Israel beheld Joseph's sons, and said, Who are these? And Joseph said unto his father, they are my sons, whom God hath given me in this place. And he said, Bring them, I pray thee, unto me, and I will bless them." And then the old grandfather, whose eyes were dim, that he could not see, kissed them and embraced them, and "said unto Joseph, I had not thought to see thy face: and lo, God hath shewed me also thy seed." The old murmuring spirit of Jacob was hushed; now he was full of praise, and he recognized the good hand of his God over him.

Joseph felt he was in the presence of God when his father was about to speak and pronounce God's blessing upon his sons, "and he bowed himself with his face to the earth." Then he took his sons, "Ephraim in his right hand toward Israel's left hand, and Manasseh in his left hand toward Israel's right hand, and brought them near unto him. And Israel stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manasseh's head, guiding his hands wittingly; for Manasseh was the first-born.'

"And he blessed Joseph," i.e., the sons of Joseph, "and said, God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the angel which redeemed me from all evil. bless the lads; and let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers, Abraham and Isaac; and let them grow into a multitude of people in the midst of the earth." Thus he appealed to a God who had kept His word. In his unbelief, when he first went forth from his father's house, and came to Beth-el he had said, "If God will keep me . . . and give me bread to eat;" now he said of Him, "The God which fed me all my life long unto this day." Then he had said, "If God will . . . keep me in this way that I go;" now he testified of Him, "The angel which redeemed me from all evil." God had been faithful, and he could not but speak of this faithfulness in the moment when he blessed his grandsons.

"And when Joseph saw that his father laid his right hand upon the head of Ephraim, it displeased him: and he held up his father's hand to remove it from Ephraim's head unto Manasseh's head. And Joseph said unto his father, Not so, my father: for this is the first-born; put thy right hand upon his head. And his father refused, and said, I know it, my son, I know it: he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great: but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he."

The choice of God from the first rested upon those whom man esteemed the least. Thus Abel, the second son, was accepted, and not Cain, the elder; Isaac and not Ishmael; Jacob and not Esau; Joseph himself above all his brethren, and Ephraim above Manasseh. "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; that no flesh should glory in His presence" (1 Cor. 1 : 27-29).

While salvation from sin is offered freely and impartially to "whosoever will" (Rev. 22 : 17), yet God reserves to Himself the right of electing certain of His children to certain work, position, sometimes suffering. His thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor His ways as our ways. In the choice of a king over Israel, when he made the sons of Jesse pass before Samuel, and he saw the tall, handsome form of Eliab, the eldest brother, the prophet said, "Surely the Lord's anointed is before me." "But the Lord said unto Samuel, Look not on his countenance, or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart" (1 Sam. 16 : 6, 7).

If, then, we have anything to do with the choice of a Christian worker for any post—if we are seeking a governess for our children, or for any helper in our house or our business—it is of the first importance that we should know absolutely the mind of God about it; that we should set aside personal advantage as not to be considered; predilections must not have a voice. What saith the Lord?—this is the great matter. He who looketh on the heart alone can judge rightly for us, and if we lay down our own will, He will surely make known His. He knoweth the end from the beginning, and with Him is perfect wisdom. It is strange that Joseph should not have understood at once, that of which his own eventful history was such a striking example. But it is often the case that, when its application touches a preconceived opinion of ours, the truth which we know most fully seems to lose its power.

"And Jacob blessed them that day, saying, In thee shall Israel bless, saying, God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh: and he set Ephraim before Manasseh. And Israel said unto Joseph, Behold, I die; but God shall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers." This is blessed, the same man whose doubting and murmuring were so noticeable, now that he saw his departure to be at hand, and that he could not in person receive fulfilment of the promises of God, instead of murmuring, strengthens the faith of his children. "Moreover," he added, "I have given to thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow." This may have been the land which Jacob bought of the children of Hamor (Gen. 33 : 19), and where Joseph was buried (Josh. 24 : 32). We may learn one other lesson from these last days of Jacob. It would have been impossible for him to have thus calmly and quietly arranged for the future, and have been thus freely occupied with his children, if his own soul had not been in a truly healthy state. Let us live as we would be when Jesus comes, or as we would be if we are called home before He comes; and then our last days will be to His glory, and will be in peace.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Land League in Ireland is Obviously Preparing for desperate resistance to the British government. A meeting of Irishmen resident in America was held in Paris on November 19th, at which Mr. Parnell was present, and plans were discussed which are said to have included an appeal to arms. This step, terrible as it would be, and without the smallest chance of success, would be less cowardly and contemptible than the policy of assassination now adopted. Confirmation of the report that the League contemplates raising the flag of civil war comes in a telegram from Brussels, which says: "Eight thousand rifles were shipped recently in some steamers at several Italian ports for Ireland; they were purchased in Switzerland by some Irishmen who had come from the United States."

Among the crimes recently committed by agents of the League, one is peculiarly atrocious. On the night of November 18th an inoffensive man was shot as he sat by his fireside reading. He had been employed to take care of an empty house from which the tenant had been evicted. Mr. Gairdner, a landowner in Galway County, was tarred and feathered by Land Leaguers on November 17th. Atrocities in all parts of the land are reported daily.

Dissensions are Reported as Existing in the British Cabinet on the question of Irish policy. This question would naturally divide the Whigs from the Radicals, and Mr. Gladstone's cabinet contains representatives of both sections. According to cable reports, Lord Selborne, the Lord High Chancellor, as the leader of the Whigs, advocates the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and the application of vigorous measures to enforce the laws in Ireland. Mr. John Bright and Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, the acknowledged representatives of the Radicals, urge the initiation of legislative concessions, and insist that no coercive measure shall be introduced by the government unless it is accompanied by some remedial measure tending to appease the disaffection of the people. The London Times, which generally correctly indicates the current of public opinion, devoted an editorial one day last week to the consideration of a scheme for the purchase by government of the estates of landowners in Ireland willing to sell, and reselling them on a purchasing lease to the tenants. The course Mr. Gladstone will take if he follow the principles which have heretofore guided him in his political career will be that which he judges most likely to secure for him and his colleagues an extended lease of power.

Winnipeg, Manitoba, is the Scene of a Religious revival which has resulted from the blessing of God on the labors of Rev. E. Payson Hammond commenced November 1st. Winnipeg was ten years ago a small trading post of the Hudson's Bay Company, with only three hundred inhabitants. Now it has a population of twelve thousand, and many imposing public buildings. At Mr. Hammond's services he has received the support of many old friends who have settled there, and the neighborhood has been thoroughly canvassed to bring in those who do not usually attend a place of worship. On November 7th over two hundred persons rose to ask for prayer; among them was a fine-looking man who said that during the past five years he had been an acrobatic performer in Dan Rice's Circus, and i was ten years since he had been in a church.

A Maori Good Samaritan, Amopui, a Native, was lately, on a bitter cold night, returning to Cambridge, New Zealand, and when some distance from the township saw the prostrate form of a man, a European, on the road. It appears that the poor fellow, with one leg only, had travelled overland all the way from Napier, had crossed creeks, surmounted hills, and threaded his way through the bush. But nature gave way at last, and he fell when Amopui found him, utterly worn out, helpless, and quite exhausted. The Maori lifted him up and carried him into Cambridge, and took him to his tent, where he attended to him the night through; but the noble fellow's good deeds did not end here. In the morning he got a subscription list, and by dint of perseverance collected more than $250, which he handed over to the police authorities to be expended in sending the poor cripple on to Auckland.

A Hundred Jesuits who Have Been Expelled from France have been sent to labor in Constantinople by the authorities of the order. It is to be feared that these subtle, indefatigable men will do a serious injury and will retard the good work now in progress under the direction of American Protestant Missionaries in Turkey. Their influence wherever they go is baneful, and the character of the Turkish mind renders it peculiarly susceptible to the teachings they inculcate.

A Sensible Suggestion in the Interest of mechanics has been made by the Earl of Derby, a statesman remarkable for eminently practical wisdom. It is that in every workshop there should be a bank established, so that when the men receive their weekly wages they may at once make a deposit, if desirous to do so, without running the gauntlet of temptation set up by the liquor stores on their way home. He says, "I do not think that it is an exaggeration to say that a penny bank in every workshop would add millions yearly to the wealth of the country. The shilling that is set aside from weekly wages should not have to pass the public house door if it can be helped; it should be put by at once."

Mrs. Gladstone, the Wife of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, is noted for her charitable disposition and for her kindness of heart which is evinced in many ways besides in donations of money. Among recent instances of this admirable trait of character are the following: When a poor governess going to a convalescent home was found to be utterly friendless and unfit to travel alone, Mrs. Gladstone escorted her all the way to South Devon, and returned to Cheshire. When a poor little lodging-house servant was sent to a hospital at Mile End Mrs. Gladstone thought nothing of driving down from Harley Street to see her in the height of the season, when she must have been overwhelmed with engagements. She often takes flowers to the Boys' Industrial Home in Eccleston Street, London.

A French Family's Conversion is thus Related by Pasteur Massie: "A man at Toulon, who was a drunkard, beat his wife frequently, to prevent her going to the meeting, but she told him she would obey him in all, except where the good of her soul was concerned. Seeing how gentle his wife was under his bad treatment, he thought he would like to hear 'what the men said,' and, accompanied by a friend, he came in late one evening, and remained near the door to listen. Since then both these men have attended every meeting. That husband has bought a Bible, and asked for separate Gospels, that he might always have one in his pocket to read while at work. The married daughter used to scoff at her father and mother, but, seeing the wonderful change in him, she too came to listen, and now is a most humble Christian, trying to bring her husband to listen to the Gospel. He is a bigoted Neapolitan fisherman, and comes to the Sunday night meetings with his wife, and joins in the hymns."

The Deplorable Results of Betting were Exemplified in a strikingly painful manner in a London police court on October 13th. For some time a man had carried on a system of fraud by passing spurious gold coin. His career was stopped at a railroad station, where he was caught in the act, and arrested. The man, when before the magistrate, seemed quite broken-hearted, and said that he deeply regretted the evil ways he had fallen into, and he had to trace his downfall to billiards and betting on horse-racing. He lost at both games, and fell from bad to worse, until he lost his situation, and then he was persuaded to become a bookmaker's decoy, but that course of life did not suit him, and then he was induced to try his hand at passing bad money, and at that he sometimes succeeded. The course of life he had been leading had separated him from his friends, who were moving in a respectable circle; and when he came out of prison he really did not know what he should do.

An English journal says: "In all our towns and cities the devil is thus luring men to certain destruction. The habituc of the saloon is not unfrequently a patron of the turf, and initiated into the vicious practice of betting, while our prisons and poorhouses could tell many a harrowing tale of manhood disgraced or destroyed, as the result of walking in the way of transgressors."

Mrs. M. Baxter, who is Laboring in Germany, writes: "The Lord continues to bless us in Mulheim, and in the villages around, and we trust there is a deep work on many souls. This week we have been led into the mountains in the heart of the Black Forest, where some spaces are cleared for cultivation, and where there is a scattered population of very poor and ignorant people, who live entirely for time and sense, and in great ignorance of the simple wa of salvation. Two or three of them had come to our Sunday meetings at Mulheim, having t walk three or four hours to come and as muc to return, and they begged us to visit them The meetings yesterday, Sunday, were held in dancing-room, open to the air; all round unde the roof was full, and the people most attentive May the Lord do a work here. We hope t commence work next week in Heidelber among the women in the name of the Lord Jesus.

A Revival Among Sailors has Taken Plac on board two of the British men-of-war engage in the European concert of vessels near Dulcigno. One of the officers conducts Bible readings on board the Monarch three evenings in th week. A little band in the Thunderer hav newly started a Bible reading. The sailo speak at testimony meetings. Altogether th movement is most cheering in both the vessel The chaplain and officers give sympathy. Th conduct of the men was most exemplary in the wanderings ashore. When these men-of-w anchored near Naples lately, the English ladi there gave a tea-meeting to the sailors in th hall of the Presbyterian Church.

That "The Dark Places of the Earth a full of the habitations of cruelty" is as true no as in the days of the Psalmist, and the need missionary effort is being made manifest dail Only last week a dispatch was received in Lo don from the west coast of Africa, announcin the death of Chaca, the Governor of Whydal The funeral was to be celedrated by a massacre natives, after which the king had announced h intention of holding the annual celebration memory of his father. The celebration will la four months, during which two hundred captu chiefs will be beheaded. The English refused go to the celebration.

ERMAN McARTHUR, M.P. LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.—His Procession crossing Westminister Bridge.

ALDERMAN WM. McARTHUR, M.P,

The New Lord Mayor of London.

First Commercial Step, at Londonderry, in 1835—His Great Success in the Australian Colonies—Practical Sympathy with Methodism—Removal to London in 1857—Is Elected Sheriff of London in 1867—Becomes M. P., for Lambeth, in 1868—His Work in Parliment—The Fiji Islands—Is made Alderman in 1872, and now Occupies the Mayoral Chair—The Office of Lord Mayor—The Procession—The Banquet—Sovereign of the City—Antiquity of City Banquets.

THE eminent London citizen whose portrait we give this week is a descendant of an old family of great respectability in Argyleshire, Scotland, but who subsequently removed to the North of Ireland. His mother was descended from an old English family. Mr. McArthur's father, the Rev. John McArthur, was a highly-esteemed minister in the Wesleyan Methodist connection, and many who have listened to the son when he has been addressing large public meetings have been reminded by his lucid and eloquent oratory of his father's earnest sermons.

The path of business, however, was to him the path of duty, for from the very earliest years he evinced a most marked aptitude for it, and he studiously set himself to run it with diligence and zeal. His first commercial step was taken about the year 1835, in Londonderry, a spot where he made a successful start in life, and which is endeared to him by tender recollections.

His undoubted business habits and consummate tact in dealing with men with whom he was brought into honorable commercial competition, the establishment by his brother, Alexander, of mercantile houses in Sydney, Melbourne, Adelaide, and Auckland, at the critical period of the gold discovery, together with the unblemished moral character which from the very outset belonged to him, secured for him a fair reputation; and the men of Londonderry have watched his onward career with much interest.

But Mr. McArthur has not confined his attention to business, as though it were the chief object of human existence and activity. For many years he has been abreast with the foremost and most energetic of Christian workers in numerous and diversified fields of usefulness. Notwithstanding his numerous engagements as a London merchant, his Methodist friends know right well that he never shrinks from any good work, and that they can be sure of his sympathy and active co-operation in the furtherance of any plans that will really tend to the good of the Connection.

He is not only "a good Methodist," but also that which is "the highest style of man"—a true Christian. It has been said that as the Wesleyan Church was cradled in hardship and toil, she has given her children similar nurture, and that the patient wisdom and plodding energy which they exhibit in various forms of Christian enterprise, are largely attributable to their Methodist training, which has braced and nerved them for the battles they have fought and won in the common struggles of life.

REMOVAL TO LONDON.

In the course of years business so prospered with Mr. McArthur in Londonderry, and his connections with Australia had become so extensive, that he deemed it expedient, in 1857, to remove to London, where his public life may be said to have begun. The Conservative Londonderry Guardian lamented his departure as a public loss, and highly eulogized his integrity and ability.

His political career commenced in 1865, when he unsuccessfully contested the borough of Pontefract. In 1868, however, at the general election, he was elected to Parliament by a large majority as the Liberal member for Lambeth, and being again elected in 1874 and 1880, he still continues its representative. In politics he is a Liberal of an advanced school. He takes an especial interest in the welfare of the working people, and enjoys the confidence of a large majority of his constituents. He has been for years a supporter of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's Permissive Bill, but he is perhaps mainly known as a member of Parliament in connection with the passing of a bill by which the emancipation of the Metropolitan bridges from toll has been secured forever.

In the previous year (1867) he served the office of Sheriff of London and Middlesex, having been unanimously elected. Mr. George Moore, the eminent philanthropist and friend of Young Men's Christian Associations, spoke of him in these terms: "Mr. McArthur is one of our merchant princes, a man of great energy of character, and of indomitable perseverance and industry. He is equally conspicuous for industry, which is the invariable concomitant of true greatness of character. He is a philanthropist, too, in the greatest sense of the word. He has given a large part of his worldly means in works of charity and mercy—he is, in short, a Christian and a gentleman."

THE ANNEXATION OF THE FIJI ISLANDS.

In the House of Commons the subject with which his name has been specially and honorably connected is that of Fiji. For many years he has been an active and valuable member of the committee of the Aborigines' Protection Society. With that humane body he manfully cooperated for the total abolition of kidnapping in the islands of the Pacific; and as a most potent means of accomplishing that object, and also of promoting the legitimate advance of British colonization, he repeatedly brought before the House of Commons a proposal to annex the Islands of Fiji.

The result of his laborious efforts—for they well deserve to be thus characterized—may now be seen in the satisfactory establishment of the British colony over which Sir A. H. Gordon, formerly Governor of Mauritius, presides. It is a singular fact that the Alderman's brother, Mr. Alexander McArthur, M.P. for Leicester, who is also a member of the committee of the Aborigines' Protection Society, brought forward many years ago in the Legislature of New South Wales a proposal for the annexation of Fiji. He argued that kidnapping, which had grown up in the South Seas, could not possibly be extirpated until the Fiji Islands, which formed the great centre of the traffic, were placed under the protection of the British flag.

MUNICIPAL DISTINCTIONS.

In 1872 Mr. McArthur was elected Alderman, and in 1878 he paid a lengthened visit to the Australian colonies, with which he is connected no less by commercial relations than by political sympathy, and everywhere met with receptions of the most flattering character. He has now attained the highest municipal and civic position in the city of London in being called to fill the chair of the Lord Mayor. He is at the same moment fulfilling some very important trusts. He is a magistrate of Surrey, and is further connected with the management of many other bodies in the British metropolis.

THE OFFICE OF LORD MAYOR.

The dignity and power of the Lord Mayor as first city officer is very great. He becomes, when sworn in, the Queen's representative in the civil government of the city, and chief justice of the metropolis. The office is one of the most constant claims on the time of its holder, and such are the restraints of its duties during the year that whoever undertakes it usually arranges his commercial affairs so as to be able to withdraw his attention from them altogether and devote his whole time to the public service. A salary in some measure appropriate to the dignity of the office is annually allowed by the Corporation, amounting to £8000, besides the use of the magnificent Mansion House as a residence, and the splendid furniture and carriages which have been provided. In the case of liberal and hospitable Lord Mayors this sum has been considerably below the actual expenditure, but with some it has been found sufficient, and a few have been so parsimonious that they have not nearly expended the amount voted for the support of the office.

THE PROCESSION.

One of the greatest occasions of expense consists in the annual procession on what is called the Lord Mayor's Day, the 9th of November, when he enters into office. On that occasion the new Lord Mayor meets the aldermen, sheriffs, recorder, and other great officers at an early hour at the Guildhall, whence in the state carriages attended by them in their respective carriages, he proceeds to Westminster Hall, where his lordship, after some ancient ceremonies, takes the prescribed oaths before the Barons of the Exchequer. He then passes with the recorder to each of the courts in the hall, and invites the several judges to dinner on that day, when he again returns to the city.

His lordship is preceded by the Artillery Company, next to which march the company of which he is a member, and then the other city companies in their regular order, with their distinguishing banners and bands of music; among the rest the armorers have usually men on horseback, completely equipped in various kinds of ancient armor. To these succeed the domestics and servants of the Lord Mayor, and then the state coach, finely ornamented with abundance of gilding, and so large as to contain between the seats two stools, on one of which, facing the door, sits the sword-bearer with the sword of state, and on the other the mace-bearer carrying the city mace. The train is closed by the carriages of the retired Lord Mayor, of the aldermen, the recorder, the sheriffs, the chamberlain, the common sergeant, the town clerk, and other great officers, and in this order the procession reaches the Guildhall.

THE BANQUET AT THE GUILDHALL.

This annual procession excites great interest, and exhibits an extraordinary display of municipal splendor. The day closes at the Guildhall by an entertainment of appropriate magnificence, at which it is common to see members of the royal family, the most distinguished public character, and often the ambassadors of foreign courts. About a thousand individuals take their seats at this dinner, to which they are admitted by tickets from the Lord Mayor and sheriffs, who, in fixed proportions, bear their share of the expense, which generally amounts to about £3000.

At this banquet the great hall is brilliantly illuminated, carpeted, and adorned with evergreens. At five o'clock the Lord Mayor, in a rich state gown and collar, accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, who has her page and maids of honor, walks majestically into the Council Chamber, where the guests are to be received. Trumpeters and marshals and sword-bearers precede them, and the aldermen, in their gayest costume, bring up the rear. The Lady Mayoress takes her seat on the throne, which is placed on a raised dais at the end of the Council Chamber, while the Lord Mayor remains standing to receive his guests. When the dinner is announced, at seven o'clock, it is the duty of the Prime Minister to conduct the Lady Mayoress to her seat in the dining-hall. The trumpeters cause the ancient building to resound with melody while the guests are taking their places; a band discourses sweet music during the dinner, after which speeches are made, and the proceedings are continued until past midnight.

THE SOVEREIGN OF THE CITY.

During his year of office the state observed by the Lord Mayor at his official residence, the Mansion House, is almost regal. Certainly no subject of Queen Victoria maintains an equal amount of courtly ceremony, nor can the state banquets of the greatest of English nobility surpass in splendor the princely entertainments continually furnished by the sovereign of the city. The frequency, too, of these hospitable gatherings, and the large numbers generally invited, lead one to imagine that the resources of the Mansion House must be as exhaustless as the wealth of the corporation.

Napoleon caught the right idea of the cause of England's greatness when he called its people "a nation of shopkeepers." Conquest and diplomacy may enrich and extend for a time, but for a nation to live and become increasingly rich and strong her prosperity must be based upon a sound system of trade. The power of England is felt on every sea, for her merchant ships are there. The wealth of England enables her to maintain her vast influence in every clime, and that wealth is drawn from her prosperous trading communities. Few of the Norman barons are to be traced through their descendants to the present time, while those who now possess the soil are chiefly descended from great bankers, goldsmiths, and other city traders. It may be hoped that the time is far distant when the office of Lord Mayor shall be open to those who only have birth as their recommendation, and closed against those who look to industry and Christian integrity as the ladder by which men may rise!

ANTIQUITY OF CITY BANQUETS.

It may here be remarked that the banquets which are universally associated with the Lord Mayor and the city guilds and companies are of a series which, without break or long interruption, has existed from the Anglo-Saxon era, through the troubles of the Danish and Norman times, through the many civil broils, the wars of York and Lancaster, through the fierce struggles of the Stuart and Cromwell factions, the great rebellion and the Revolution of 1688; they have contributed to form the character of the great London trading community, mitigating the antagonisms of business competition, and encouraging mutual respect, confidence, and brotherly feeling.

In entering upon his high and responsible office, Alderman McArthur will be followed by the prayers of multitudes of God's people, for though his love of Methodism has "grown with his growth, and strengthened with his strength," he has co-operated with Christians generally in their works of faith and labors of love.

THE HEAVENLY BODIES.

When we consider how important a part "signs in heaven" are to play in the commotions attending the conflagration of the last days (Isa. 34:4; Luke 21:25; 2 Pet. 3:10, 12; Rev. 6:13, 14), we may read with interest the following account from The Providence Journal of the positions and appearance of the principal planets during the present month:

Saturn is evening star, and though a lesser light than the glowing Jupiter, surpasses him in interest during the month. He has passed his opposition or nearest point to the earth, but is still travelling toward his perihelion or nearest point to the sun, which he will not reach till 1884. Therefore he will appear brighter than he did this year at the next opposition of 1881, and still brighter at each succeeding one till 1884, when he will be 100,000,000 miles nearer the sun than at his most distant point, and put on his most glorious phase.

The rings will continue to open until 1885, when they will reach their widest extent, and the planet will also reach the point of greatest northern declination within the same period. The years 1881–1885 are the golden season for astronomers of the present to make a special study of Saturn. When in 1907 the conditions of the present are partially repeated, the vision that is now clear and far-seeing will become dim by the passage of time, and if twenty-five years is the average length for an astronomer's vigorous power of observation, when Saturn sweeps round again toward perihelion a new race of observers will take the place of those who now wonder and admire as the glory of the Saturnian system is revealed to their enchanted eyes.

Perhaps by that time continued observations and improved instruments may determine whether there is a triple ring besides the dusky ring, whether the rings are made up of clouds of satellites too small to be seen separately, and so close together to allow the intervals between them to be visible, or whether the rings are approaching the planet.

We never see this magnificent planet through the telescope without wishing that the picture of surpassing loveliness could be painted on the nightly sky, and that all who gaze upon the starry depths might behold the entrancing spectacle, a glorious orb, encircled by golden rings, and surrounded by glittering points of light, the coloring so clear and softly toned that the brightest earthly tints seem muddy in comparison, the grandeur of the spectacle transcending the power of the pen to paint.

[Along with this beautiful picture of the perishable heavens the Christian will think of Rev. 21:1: "I saw a new heaven and a new earth; for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away; and there was no more sea."]

Saturn and Jupiter are both moving south, and Saturn's slower motion will increase the distance between them, so that he rises and sets about fifty minutes later throughout the month. He sets now not far from 5 o'clock in the morning; at the end of the month about 3.

Neptune is evening star after the 4th, when he is in opposition. Though too distant to be seen with the naked eye, he is in excellent position for telescopic observation, showing a decided disk and a coloring of bluish white. He also is travelling toward perihelion, which he reaches in 1884. If we had eyes to see the outer planets as they roll we should behold three of them—Jupiter, Saturn, and Neptune—almost in a line with the earth and sun, their masses uniting in a point upon the central orb.

The disturbance in the movements of Uranus was the means of the discovery of Neptune, for this most distant member of the brotherhood was not really introduced to our acquaintance till 1846, and it will take him till 2011 to complete his first circle round the sun since his existence was detected. With our present conditions of being we shall not be in haste to migrate to Neptune. The sun at that distance appears a little larger than Venus, at her greatest dimensions, and gives 1000th part of the light with which the earth is blessed. Astronomers are sighing for more worlds to conquer. Neptune has perturbations indicating an outside brother, and systematic efforts are being made to gather the far-away wanderer into the system.

Mercury is evening star till the 23d of November, when he is in inferior conjunction with the sun, and passing to his western side joins the morning stars.

Jupiter is evening star, and though shining with royal grace as he mounts grandly to the zenith, presents no new phase nor perceptible diminution. The great spot still lights his disk with its ruddy line, and, though he has passed perihelion, believers in the agency of the planets in producing solar commotion will see evidence of a retreating pull in the battalions of snowflakes that in mid-October overwhelmed the West and blockaded the trains with snowdrifts ten feet high; in the terrific sea that raged on the Western lakes; in the unseasonable severity of the Canadian snow-storms; in the shocks of earthquake on the Spanish peninsula; and in the frightful warfare of the elements in Buenos Ayres that caused the death of more than a million of cattle in mid-September. Jupiter is now more than an hour above the horizon at sunset, and sets shortly after 4 o'clock in the morning; at the end of the month about 2.

Venus is evening star, and was charming to behold in the southwest throughout November. Venus and Jupiter are so situated with regard to each other that they form the most attractive feature of the sky in the early evening.

Mars is morning star, but there is little to commend him to notice during the month, as he rises and sets so nearly at the same time with the sun. He rises now at a little before 6.30, preceding the sun only a few minutes; at the close of the month about 6.15, nearly an hour before the sun.

Uranus is a morning star, and is coming toward us, but is still too far away to be of any account among planetary notabilities. He rises now about 2 o'clock; at the end of the month about midnight.

THE MINER'S DYING LETTER.

Scratched on his Water-bottle in the Dark.

In the explosion of the Seaham Mine in Durham, England, one of the entombed miners named Michael Smith scratched a letter to his wife on his water-bottle with the point of a bratice nail. A fac-simile of this letter reduced to one half the size is given above.

It is necessary to explain that the address of Smith, which appears in heavier and more distinct writing on the upper portion of the flask, had been marked there for some time, and grown rusted. On the other side he had scratched the words, "Look at the bottom;" his obvious reason being that the plain flat surface at the bottom afforded a better ground for writing on. When he had filled up this oval space, he continued the letter, as seen above, on the less battered side of the flask; and it would appear that the last words, "Oh, what an awful position we are in," were added some time after ward, probably not long before his death. They are less firm than the rest of the writing.

Michael Smith, who was thirty-seven years of age at the time of this fatality, was the son of a schoolmaster in the county of Durham. He was evidently a good writer, and could also play the violin fairly well. Two of his children are living, the "little Michael," so touchingly named in the letter, having died on the day of the explosion. The poor widow was nursing her sick child when she heard the dull thud that bore the message of a more terrible deprivation.

In dying, Michael Smith had clasped this bottle so closely under the right arm that it escaped the notice of the explorers, even when the body had been brought to the surface; and it was the afflicted wife and mother who herself made the discovery of this sad relic, which she now treasures with the greatest affection at St. Henary Street, Seaham.

THE PASSION PLAY.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, November 28th, 1880.

"Seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame."—HEB. 6: 6.

A GREAT pestilence in Germany. The time 1633. The superstitious and ignorant villagers think they may avert the wrath of heaven by promising every ten years to enact the sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ on a theatrical stage. The decades are to be counted from 1640, and so every ten years, with some exceptions, and for two hundred and forty years the Passion Play was enacted in Germany.

The theatre was one hundred and sixteen feet by one hundred and sixty-eight. The boom of a gun woke the villagers at a very early hour. At half past seven o'clock in the morning the audience is in the theatre. Another boom of the gun at eight o'clock announces that the play has begun, and it goes on until the evening.

There are

in that play. Act the first, Christ's entry into Jerusalem, followed by other acts, depicting scenes in the life of Christ until the fourteenth act, which is Christ sentenced to death; the fifteenth act, Christ bearing the cross; the sixteenth act, the crucifixion and descent from the cross; the seventeenth act, the resurrection; the eighteenth act, the ascension.

Joseph Meyer impersonates Jesus Christ, and hangs for twenty minutes upon the cross, suspended by a loop around his waist. Gregor Leckner impersonates Judas, and stirs the mirth of the audience. Joseph Meyer, the chief tragedian, and Gregor Leckner, the chief comedian. Men and women are elaborately trained to take their parts, and they impersonate Magdalen and Martha and Simon and John, and the sanhedrim, and the executioners. At one time on the stage are six hundred people. The scene is overwhelming.

Joseph Meyer plays the part so well that he is more reverenced in the village than would be the emperor. When he was a soldier in the German army the Government made an especial enactment that he might wear his long hair uncut. A friend, who was present last summer at the Passion Play, tells me that while sharp and cutting hail fell through the unroofed theatre upon the cheek of Joseph Meyer, he winced not, and under the most powerful field-glass no signs of life could be detected when he was playing insensible. A friend of my family tells us that, being present last summer, she felt the power of this tragedy as she had never felt any tragedy before. She says: "I never fainted before in all my life; but when I saw the spear seemingly pierce the side of Christ, and the blood and the water flow forth, I fainted dead away."

The Passion Play will probably never be enacted again in Germany, or any part of Europe. The Pope of Rome has denounced it. Although it had all the prestige of a religious ordinance, and the authority of centuries, it has been enacted for the last time. And right upon the heels of that announcement came to us a few weeks ago the announcement that the Passion Play was to become an American institution. All the machinery for that production had been prepared. Vast expectations had been created in some quarters. This morning the play is withdrawn. Public sentiment came up through the press, came up through the pulpit, came up from the churches, came up from ten thousand homes, came up from Jews and Gentiles, Protestants and Roman Catholics, from North and South, East and West, and all that feeling was hurled in against the proposed infamy. I thank God that it has been withdrawn, and it is the grandest compliment ever given to the Christian sentiment of America.

But, my friends, are you under the delusion that this announcement, which has come to me since I entered the pulpit—the withdrawal of this play—that because of that withdrawal such plays are not to be attempted in other cities? Are you not aware of the fact that there are being enacted in this country, winter after winter, great indecencies in the way of public entertainments in the opera-houses and the theatres and the concert halls of this country—great indecencies, upon which the law of our cities and the law of the United States Government ought to put their hands?

Now is the time, in this particular crisis, while the whole attention is drawn to this subject, that the churches of Jesus Christ, the printing-presses, and all the influences that are abroad in the community utter themselves most emphatically, and say in regard to all baleful styles of amusement, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further." Why, we began to think in this country people might advertise any kind of entertainment they chose; might put their placards in the show-windows of our stores, shocking the common decency of the people who passed down the street, and there were no police, and there were no mayors, and there were no members of common councils that dared anathematize those things.

Now, my friends, there will be a change in this subject, and the officers in our cities who have control of all these matters will begin to see that there is a force of public opinion that will hold them up in any attempt they make for the overthrow of bad morals and for the establishment of good morals.

There was no class of persons so much interested in the prohibiting of the Passion Play as the dramatists. Some of them have been toiling a long while for the elevation of the stage. They have declared that it was a school of good morals, and they wanted Christian people to help them in the reformation of the stage. Joseph Jefferson and Edwin Booth and Mr. Wallack and other reformers of the stage could not afford to have the Passion Play enacted, and therefore there came protests from across the sea, and protests from all parts of the land. These men understood that, once the Passion Play enacted on the stage of Booth's Theatre, the theatre would suffer a degradation which these reformers of the next twenty years could not have cured.

The men to discipline the churches are churchmen. The men to discipline the theatres are theatrical men. Things were growing so hot that I believe if this play had not been withdrawn, the managers and the lessees, the tragedians and the comedians, the employers and the employees of our theatres would have banded together, and they would have gone to the Mayor's room in New York City and have protested against the production of this Passion Play, and demanded in the interest of their profession that it be put down, and put down immediately.

Now, there were

TWO OR THREE WAYS TO STOP IT.

One was the way it has been stopped, by public opinion, and before these managers went on with any great outlay. You must understand that the elaboration of this play, the fixing up of the stage, the drilling of actors and supernumeraries in this matter was a great affair. You must understand that to describe the bloody sweat of Christ, and the tides of life rushing through his crushed heart, and the sham lightning and thunder which were to depict the awful night in which Jesus died—all that required great elaboration. Having expended so much money in this play already, the whole play having been recited, and the costumes prepared, and the spectacular arranged, it is a matter of great congratulation. Mr. Abbey had the courage to stop just here and now.

If it had gone on, popular indignation would have come to a higher and higher point until some night when the blasphemy was being enacted the police of New York would have rushed upon the scene and arrested the participators. All that has been averted. The time to arrest a crime like that is before it is committed. Some people said, "Why, this was proposed for December; here we are in November: you cannot arraign a crime before it is committed." Absurd! If your life were threatened, when would be the time to arraign the threatened assassin? Before the murder, or after the murder? If some one threatened that he would burn down your barns after the crops were in, must you wait until the torch is applied? Ah, no!

The reason this play has been stopped—and Mr. Abbey says so in his card this morning—the reason it is stopped is because public sentiment condemns it, and I tell you this is a Christian nation. It may be very different from what we would like to have it, but so far as that is it is a Christian nation, and no man can afford to offend the Christian sentiment of this country. People say, 'Oh, these church people, these Christian people are of no very great importance; they have no special influence; they are a goody-goody sort of people, well enough to have in the world, but they can easily be quelched." You cannot quelch them. They hold the balance of power in the United States to-day. No man can be elected to a Legislature or a Congress or to the Presidential chair if he be a pronounced infidel. Christian people may seem to be very indifferent and very careless, but when once you insult their Lord they are fully armed.

People say, "Why have all this ado about the Passion Play when Christian ministers and very good people again and again have seen it in Bavaria, and have wept under its enactment?" Ah! my friends, the circumstances were very different. They were a simple-minded people over there. Amid many crude images of religion they performed this play in gratitude to God for the averting of the pestilence. The people, for the most part, who took any interest in it and who played upon the stage were people consecrated to the work from their infancy. All this did not excuse it, but it alleviated it. I tell you it would have been to have the Passion Play enacted in New York City. A gentleman who was present with his family at the exhibition in Germany last summer told me that he regretted exceedingly that he had taken his children to see it, for, he said, there were so many ridiculous things in that Passion Play that his children now cannot read the Scriptures without bursting into a guffaw at the remembrance of something that transpired in the Passion Play.

On this side of the Atlantic there could have been no alterations. It would have been very easy for us,-perhaps, to have found people who would take the part of Judas, or Herod, or Pilate, or Caiaphas, or Magdalen; but where would we have found a Christ? Not in my profession, not in yours, not in medicine, not in law, not in merchandise, not in agriculture. Would he have come, then, from the drama? Where would you have found the sinless being? Where was he born? How old is he? Where is the man whose thoughts have aways been pure, and whose actions have aways been self-sacrificing, and whose life has been perfect? Bring him forth then. Let us see who he is. Put him in a golden chariot. Let him be drawn by white horses.

Oh, those who proposed to enact this play made no such pretension of goodness. They did not pretend to be perfect of heart or perfect of life. Just ordinary players were, in this the latter part of the nineteenth century, and in the full blaze of civilization and Christianity, to treat the world to a crucifixion. There are MANY DISAPPOINTED PEOPLE THIS MORNING.

There are infidels and sceptics in this country who hoped to have the last scene of the Saviour's life turned into a scenic farce. It would have been no difficult thing to get executioners, not merely to slay in optical delusion, but the very Christ whom he proposed to impersonate. Christ has been an offense to the impurity and the wickedness of the world so long a time, there are men who would like to put Him out of existence; who, if they could reach the throne of God, would like to dethrone Him.

Ah! my friends, Jesus Christ—and we might as well understand it now as ever—Jesus Christ stands nearer to the Christian heart, nearer to the hearts of millions of people in this country than any other being; and I want to tell you who have the management of the amusements in this country, you must keep your hands off the cross of the Son of God. Do what you will with Christ's manger, with Christ's sepulchre.

HANDS OFF THE CROSS!

Keep hands off the upright beam of the cross, for against that Christ's fainting head leaned—off the horizontal beam of the cross, for against that Christ's hands were pinioned. There is only one stage appropriate for such a tragedy—the rocky mountain back of Jerusalem. The only drop-scene fit for such an occasion, midnight fallen on midnoon. The only appropriate plaudits, the crash of the falling rocks, and the opening of the sepulchre, and the stalking forth of the sheeted dead, and the falling of the blanched spectators upon their faces as they cry, "This is the Son of God!"

My friends, I am glad that this play has here been smitten with popular indignation. I suppose it will be taken to other cities. This is not the first trial. It tried San Francisco, and was hurled back, and San Francisco certainly has never been charged with being sanctimonious or over-righteous or bigoted. The Passion Play was driven back from the gates of the Pacific, and now it was proposed here. It is driven or to be driven from the City of New York. I suppose it will lift its head in other cities, but we want it to go away from our cities so damaged that it will attract but little attention elsewhere. If it had been received here, and successfully, it would have been welcomed elsewhere. People imitate success. They never imitate a failure.

Now, I do not suppose it is possible for me to estimate the outrage that was just ahead of us. I make a hypothesis. You remember all the scene around —your mother and sisters, the physician with a watch in his hand, the blinds darkened, the last deep sigh that put an end to the pilgrimage of earthly vicissitude, the obsequies, the funeral psalm, the awful burial; for though there were flowers upon the casket, and there were many consolations of the Gospel offered, still death was awful. For how much would you consent to have that death-scene of your father enacted on the boards of a theatre by strangers, imitating your weeping mother and your weeping sisters, and a stranger enacting your dying father? Why, sirs, if here were not law enough to stop it, you would with your own right arm break in upon the scene, hough you perished in the attempt.

YOUR FATHER'S DEATH-BED

Now I want you to know that Christ is nearer han any friend—near than father, mother, husband, vife, son, daughter. How shall I prove it? Why, shall prove it by the fact that men have given up heir homes and gone out to die on the scaffold or at he stake for the Lord Jesus Christ. Now, let those vho manage the amusements of this country keep heir hands off the cross. You can better afford to o into Germany and insult their popular emperor, r into England and insult her magnificent queen, han anywhere in Christendom and insult Christ.

Have we got so exhausted in our amusements in is country that it is necessary in any of our cities rom this time forth to put the Lord's supper and e crucifixion before the footlights? One would ink we would not be very much crowded in this ountry or in this world for amusements, for entertainments—a world where out of three hundred nd sixty-five days of the year we have three hunred days of sunshine, and the manufactories are rning out flutes, and harps, and violins, and anos, and cornets, and organs, and we have great ngers all the way from Jenny Lind to Emma bbott, and great painters all the way from Benmin West to Bierstadt, and great humorists all the ay from Jack Downing to the Burlington Hawke, and concert halls and lyceums, and skate and t and oar, and Christmas tree and Thanksgiv festival, and day and night.

Never let us open the door of darkness and invoke anything vile to come forth to amuse us in such a glorious world with ten thousand opportunities of innocent amusement. I shall be glad that this attempt was made if it awake the whole land to put prohibition upon unrighteous entertainments. If this influence begun this morning goes on, if the common councils of our cities, if our mayors, if our men in public places shall take courage now and say, "We are going to sweep Brooklyn and New York and all our cities of these abominations," then it will be one of the most fortunate things that ever happened that the Passion Play was threatened for New York.

Besides that, it will be a good thing if it arouses our loyalty to the Lord Jesus Christ, who hung upon the accursed tree. When I meet Him, when you meet Him—and we soon shall, God grant we all may—when we meet Him it will be well for us if we never misused His name or dishonored His influence among the nations. On that day it will not be an impersonation with gory temples and bleeding side, on the boards of the theatre, but it will the emperor on a throne, and burning worlds the footlights, the music the archangel's trumpet, the choir the one hundred and forty and four thousand leading, the congregation made up of kings and queens and conquerors. Unto Him be glory and dominion, victory and song, now and forever, on earth and in heaven. Amen and amen.

TWO DUBLIN POLICEMEN CONVERTED.

IN Dublin, in 1865, the Rev. Achilles Daunt was sent for to visit a young man dying of diphtheria. Through Mr. Daunt's simple declaration of the Father's love and the Saviour's atonement he had been led to a quiet resting on Jesus. Mr. Daunt sat with him for hours, as the gasping life was ebbing away. He held him up on his bed till his own hand and arm became quite cold from the pressure of the almost lifeless body. Just before he breathed his last the dying man implored Mr. Daunt to take a message from him to the people who assembled in the Dublin Exhibition next evening. "I shall be with Christ," he said; "but beg of them all, especially the young men, not to put off preparing to meet their God till they come to where I am now." The man died that night. Next evening, when the eyes of the vast crowd were all fixed upon the preacher, he said, "I have

A MESSAGE TO YOU FROM THE DEAD."

The stillness was almost awful as with simple pathos he described the dying scene, and pressed home to every conscience the message, "Prepare to meet thy God."

Some months afterward his sister met him coming toward home, late in the afternoon, with a radiant face. She pressed him to come home and take some food, as he had had nothing since breakfast. "I have had something better to eat," he said, "than you can give me." And taking her by the arm he went down the road with her, and gave her the following account of the

CONVERSION OF TWO POLICEMEN.

"Just now," he said, "I saw a policeman coming to meet me, who looked so bright and so glad to see me that, though I could not recall his face or name to mind, I thought my memory was at fault, and that he must be an old acquaintance. So I put out my hand and said so to him. 'Oh, sir, you don't know me, but I know you well, for you brought me to Christ." "How so?" Well, dear sir, do you remember giving a message from the dead one night in the exhibition? I was there that night, and felt the words cut me to the heart. I hurried home, and such days of misery as I endured before peace filled my soul, before I knew I was pardoned. But at last it came; and then my first thought was for my brother, who is also in the constabulary. I longed for him to share my joy, and, sir, the only thing I could think of was to bring him to hear you; and now we are both on our way to heaven."

One evening, after service in the Exhibition, asked to have an interview. He was in a state of deep spiritual anxiety. He had been very much touched by the loving address he had just heard. He was painfully struck, also, by the contrast between the simple scriptural teaching that had come with such music to his soul, and the dogmas to which he had been accustomed. The two men kneeled together in earnest prayer to the Father who loved them both and knew their needs. They clasped each other's hands and parted, never to meet again on earth. But we trust they will be side by side when our Lord marshals together the ranks of His redeemed.

A YOUNG ROMAN CATHOLIC PRIEST

TWO SISTERS' LIVES BLIGHTED BY STRONG DRINK.

By Mrs. Evans, of Falmouth, England.

ABOUT eighteen years ago, at Stoke, near Devonport, there lived with their parents two daughters, happy and contented, in a comfortable home. The hospitable sideboard of that dwelling was furnished with the liquors so mistakenly deemed necessary for the proper entertainment of guests. But of these drinks those daughters were not permitted to partake. But at last there came a man in good worldly circumstances who entered into that house and solicited the hand of the eldest daughter in marriage, took her to London, and there, giving way to an unnatural craving for drink, that man, in a comparatively short space of time, squandered £3000 in gratifying his appetite, while his wife existed in the utmost misery, suffering, and privation. At last the drink, precursor of sickness and untimely death, did its work, and that husband lay on his death-bed.

There stood by his side three brothers—one a clergyman, another a lawyer, and the third a wealthy manufacturer. In their presence that dying husband cursed the drink which had ruined him, body and soul. He had blighted, he said, and made wretched, the life of that one whom he had promised at the altar to love and cherish, and now, with his fast ebbing breath, he regretted a misspent life, and begged his wife's forgiveness. But of what avail was that? The wrongs which he had committed during years of debauchery could not be undone in death. And there, with the hand of forgiveness in that of her dying husband, stood a weeping, heart-broken wife.

Again a man entered that home at Stoke, took that other daughter, and placed her in a comfortable home and circumstances. But the demon drink entered in, and that man, who was a good husband when out of liquor, became a slave to Bacchus. The wife stood night after night in London streets alone and comfortless. Once, standing on London Bridge, she contemplated ending her miserable existence, but God stayed her. One night in November she received a telegram to come to Bideford, and on arriving found her husband with his throat cut, self-inflicted while under the influence of the cursed drink. She knelt by his side and prayed that his life might be spared. The prayer was answered; he survived the diabolical attempt upon his own life, but only to become a raving maniac. That man is now in Exeter Lunatic Asylum, and his wife is the woman who stands before you. Once on visiting him he said to me, "Maria, wherever you go tell men and women the drink—the cursed drink—brought me here." Mrs. Evans continued to relate her sad tale to a weeping audience, many of whom, in the hope of profiting by her sad experience, stepped forth and pledged themselves to total abstinence.

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

Summary of the Story.

The family of the Anerleys consists of Mr. and Mrs. Anerley, one son, Cecil, and two daughters, Emily and Constance, the heroine of the story. Mr Anerley was interested in work at Albert Mission Hall, in London. While addressing the poor people Mr. Anerley was stricken with death. The bereaved family was much helped by the friendship and counsel of the Rev. Hermann Ferguson, of whose church Mr. Anerley had been an honored officer. He secured a position for Constance Anerley in his aunt's school at Aix-la-Chapelle, whence she afterward returned and became a governess in a family at Brighton. At the suggestion of Mr. Ferguson, Mrs. Anerley resolves to accept Salome Stanley, a young and lovely woman, as a boarder into her house. Her history, so far as the minister knows it, is sad. She is a lawyer's orphan daughter, and has hitherto lived the life of a recluse. After living some time at the Anerley's house Cecil proposed marriage to her, upon which she acknowledged that she was already married, and that her husband, who was intemperate, had left her. She now becomes much benefited by Mr. Ferguson's preaching, and, on making application for permission to partake of the Lord's Supper, expresses her determination not to taste a drop of intoxicating wine. Christmas comes round, and Mrs. Mitchell, the mother of the children to whom Constance Anerley is governess, visits Canterbury, Constance accompanying her and her young charges. During an afternoon walk in the midst of beautiful grounds, Constance Anerley is accosted by a strange, dissipated-looking man, who announces himself to be the husband of her friend, Salome Stanley. In connection with the mission work in the Albert Street Hall free breakfasts are given to the destitute. Salome Stanley identifies herself with the work, and one morning, among the nondescript guests at the Hall, meets with her long-absent husband in a state of destitution and very ill. She prevails upon him to accompany her to a retired country lodging at the house of Mrs. Fleet, who had been her nurse in her childhood, and there try to begin life anew.

An Anxious Tea-time at Mrs. Fleet's—Salome Searching for her Hxsband—Mr. Fleet's Intelligence—He goes in quest of Orlanda.

Mrs. Fleet's rooms to which Salome Stanley decided on removing with her dissipated husbann were admirably adapted to the purpose she had in view of caring for him and if possible effecting his reformation.

Cheerful and sunny, with a delightful view of the beautiful Medway river and the fine bridge, and a pretty little garden before the house, gay with spring flowers over the porch—bachelors' buttons showed graceful bunches of maize-colored beauty in contrast with the bright green leaves. Salome had her American organ and her piano brought from London to her sitting-room; some good engravings were hung on the walls, and books and little articles of vertu were scattered tastefully about. For a few days these things amused Orlando Stanley: he walked a short distance with Salome in the pleasant country, he sauntered about the charming grounds of the old castle, he attended service with her a few times in the venerable cathedral.

She had been as firm as a rock from the very first, that not a penny of her money should pay for any intoxicating liquor, and much as he had grumbled at the stipulation, he now seemed to accede to her rules with tolerable grace.

Suffering from a bad headache one day, she fell fast asleep after dinner, while her husband paced up and down the little garden outside.

She had begun to imagine that there was some reawakening in him to a better life, some kind of regard for herself; his tone had been less harsh, less ironical during the last few days; perhaps she might win him yet. Her last letter from Emily Anerley, with whom she regularly corresponded, had contained a kind message of hearty approval of her conduct and sympathy with her aim from Hermann Ferguson, which had cheered her in her often difficult path. "He had also said," wrote Emmie, "tell Salome Stanley that we had the communion, with both sorts of wine, last Sunday for the first time, and I never have seen so many around the table before. The interest excited by the investigation of the question which she was unintentionally the means of starting has led many of our young people to think more deeply on the whole subject, and also I find many of them who were good teetotalers had hitherto sat down to the Lord's Supper in other chapels, because they had deemed it useless to expect a change at our own. I wish she could have joined us."

She had simply done what she felt to be her duty, yet how useful it had proved! This had been her grateful thought as she fell asleep. When she at last awoke from her long nap, she looked at the clock upon the mantelpiece, and found it was almost tea-time; how long she had slept!

But she felt refreshed and ready for the meal—ready to try to be a pleasant companion to Orlando. She looked, out of the window, intending to speak to her husband as he passed, but he was not there. She rang the bell, and Mrs. Fleet appeared.

"We will have tea now, nurse," said Salome, using as she sometimes did this familiar name when they were alone, and the good woman would answer her, as she did on this occasion, "Yes, my dear young lady."

"Where is Mr. Stanley? He has not gone out into the town, has he?" She could not conceal her anxiety, and Mrs. Fleet was sufficiently in her confidence to know that the answer she must give would not be satisfactory.

"I am afraid he is. I didn't know he was gone till I asked Betsy, and she said he went out of the garden and turned toward the town."

"Perhaps he will be in by the time tea is ready."

Everything was prepared for a tempting, pleasant meal: a golden sponge-cake, delicate slices of bread-and-butter, a dish of crisp water-cresses, and a pile of hot toast, browned by Mrs. Fleet's own careful hands. But he did not come. Salome waited a full hour.

"Perhaps he didn't think of the time, my dear Mrs. Stanley," said the landlady when Salome summoned her again.

"I must go and seek him, nurse."

"My dear child, you must do no such thing until you have had some tea; your head was so bad at dinner-time that you could not eat. We shall have you ill if you take so little care of yourself."

"Then will you have tea with me, nurse? I have no heart to sit down alone."

"Yes, if you wish it."

So Mrs. Fleet accepted Salome's invitation to tea, and the good woman so skilfully turned the anxious wife's attention to old times as to make her somewhat less mindful of her present trouble. The fragrant beverage refreshed her, and by the time she had finished she was inclined to be a little more hopeful. It was possible that Orlando might have explored the country in some direction further than he had intended, or had himself fallen asleep at the old castle. Yes, that was even more likely, for his strength was not sufficient for a long walk. She would stroll up there herself and see if she could find him. But tea must be kept waiting for him, for they might miss each other, and he might return without her and want it.

It was a lovely evening, almost at the end of May, and the air was soft and balmy, laden with the sweet breath of the coming summer. The grand old tower of Bishop Gundulph, which retains his name and enshrines his memory, though eight hundred years have passed since he added it to the still more ancient portions of the castle, looked dark and massive against the soft, opal-tinted sky, where a "young May moon" shaped its crescent form, waxing clearer and clearer in the slowly fading light of day. The doves and pigeons that have taken up their abode in such numbers in this chosen spot were roosting now, and only an occasional soft, sleepy "coo" betokened their presence.

There was no trace of her husband for Salome to discover. She encountered several pairs of happy lovers, enjoying the beauty of the night and the joy of their own hearts; she met, too, older married couples, some of these alone, conversing confidentially, some with their merry children, and her heart was heavy as she contemplated all these. Life had brought to her little of serenity and peace. Her passionately-loved young brother she had lost early. Her father's eccentricities had pained and perplexed her. Her husband, for whom she had taken so false a step, and endured so much, had repaid her affection with cold neglect, and had hardly been a husband to her even in name. Cecil Anerley! Poor Cecil, she had only made him unhappy! He had loved her as she would like to have been loved, but, alas! scarcely any one seemed to have been the better that she had lived. Would her present undertaking succeed, or would she also fail to win back the wanderer from the error of his ways?

Slowly she at length turned from the old castle and proceeded homeward. What should she find there?

She opened the gate of the little garden and paused to look at the beauty of the sky reflected in the calm waters of the Medway below. Mrs. Fleet had heard her at the gate, and met her at the door.

"Is he come?"

"No, Mrs. Stanley." The good woman followed her young mistress respectfully into her sitting-room. "Would you like Fleet to go and see if he can find him, my dear young lady?"

"Has Mr. Fleet come in?"

"Yes."

"Indeed I should, only it would trouble him too much, and he must be tired."

"The walk would not hurt him," said Mrs. Fleet; then she paused, and hesitated to recommence, as if anxious, yet reluctant, to speak.

"What is it, nurse? Do you know where my husband is?"

Thus questioned, the good creature began her story.

"When Fleet came home, he asked if Mr. Stanley was in, and I said no; and he asked again, 'Does Mrs. Stanley know where he is?' and I said no, you had been expecting him, and were gone to the castle to look for him. He said, 'She won't find him there,' and I asked why, and he said, 'Because he isn't in any such place.' Then I said, 'You have seen him, have you?' and he said, 'I could have sworn to him, and yet I didn't want to be sure, so I asked if he was in, and when you said he wasn't, I knew my eyes hadn't deceived me.' 'Where is Mr. Stanley then?' I asked; 'why don't you tell me, Fleet?' 'He's in one of the lowest, vilest saloons in Chatham, that's where he is,' he answered. 'I saw him go in with another fellow, a soldier, more than two hours ago, and I was afraid he would give our good young lady trouble.' That's what my husband said; and then he told me to say, that if you wished him to, he would speak to the publican, and warn him that there would not be any drink paid for if Mr. Stanley ran up a score, and he would also try to get him home for you."

"It would be real charity," said Salome; "and if he thinks I could do any good I will come too."

"My dear Miss Salome," exclaimed the good woman; "there, I can't help forgetting and calling you that, but, my dear young lady, you must not dream of going; it would be almost enough to taint the character of the purest lady that ever breathed to be seen going there."

"I don't think that," expostulated Salome gently; "sin only can really assail us, though association may seem to do so, and is, I grant, often very dangerous. But if Mr. Fleet is so kind as to do this for me, will it not be wise for him to go to the house in a cab, and fetch him home in haste? But do ask him to be careful. I believe Orlando Stanley is very quarrelsome when in liquor."

This idea of the cab was thought to be very good by Mr. Fleet, who, having by this time finished tea, departed on his errand.

Absalom Fleet, who had been for years clerk to a lawyer in Chatham, was somewhat of a character, albeit very pleasant in his eccentricity. Though he spent all his business hours in Chatham as the clerk of one of the most irascible men of law in existence, and his friends had often advised him to live nearer the office that he might run less risk of offending Mr. Gilkes by his possible want of punctuality, Mr. Fleet would never listen to their persuasions. His long walk to and from business, rarely avoided by riding, improved his digestion, he said, and certainly both his health and spirits were of the best.

To see him start every morning from his home with a choice bloom in his buttonhole, to witness the radiant smile he turned back to Fern Cottage and its kind, worthy, and most practical mistress, to hear the sweet, clear voice in which he sang or whistled some favorite bar that echoed in his memory from last night's violin practice, were to see and to hear things well worthy of any man's eyes and ears, or of woman's either.

Salome Stanley, in her calm, pale beauty, with a depth of passion lying so surely underneath her outward serenity, surrounded by the sad sorrow of her life, was an object of great and kindly interest to her landlord. In what his loving wife called "Fleet's strange way," he likened her to many very different things—a swan, a snowdrop, a deer, a saint, and the moon.

He went willingly now to do her errand of mercy toward her guilty husband. On his way, when near the public house into which he had seen Orlando Stanley enter with his companion, "like sheep to the slaughter," he took a cab, drove up to the door, alighted, and entered.

ELEVEN SIGNS OF THE NEARING ADVENT OF CHRIST.

6. Human efforts at self-regeneration.—I do not say this of the Church, though there are some tokens of it even in her. But I speak of the world. Man seems now to be putting forth every effort to regenerate himself without God. Amid all the modern achievements of science and of art he has lost sight of his own helplessness and dependence on Him who created him. He thinks to be a God to himself. It is as if, before God's glorious purpose of restitution is brought to pass, man is to be allowed to do his utmost for the renewal of himself and of the world. He is to be put to the proof. He is to be permitted to boast himself for a little, and congratulate himself upon the triumph before him. Hence the vainglorious speeches we so often hear of man's powers and man's prospects. Political reforms are spoken of as the regeneration of the world. One party most loudly maintains that the separation of Church and State is to usher in the Millennium; another as boldly affirms that it is the union of Church and State that is to accomplish this.

EDUCATION, SCIENCE.

iterature, philosophy, are sometimes called the world's regenerators, and no limits are assigned to the blessings which these are to confer upon the world. It is curious, also, to observe, for some years past, how eagerly science has been putting forth all its energies in pursuit of discoveries that shall restore fruitfulness to the soil. Agricultural chemistry has shot up into a separate study. As if unconsciously prescient of the earth's deliverance from the curse of barrenness, men are laboring to do all that science can to hasten on that day of restitution. These efforts at self-regeneration must prove abortive; for man cannot undo either his sin or its consequences. They may succeed to a certain extent, but only to prove how little they can effect. These are, however, signs of a coming deliverance. For when man's endeavors shall prove fruitless, both in reference to himself and society, and the soil which he tills, God shall at length interpose and accomplish the work of renovation by the word of His power.

THE SPREAD OF KNOWLEDGE.

7. "Many are running to and fro, and knowledge is increasing" (Daniel 12 : 4). Nor is it knowledge of one kind, but of every kind, secular and sacred. It is, however, for the former that this age is specially distinguished. And Satan is putting forth his utmost resources of power and craft thus to lead men captive at his will. He is the prince of all knowledge where God is not known; of all power where God is not acknowledged; the bright archangel of the natural man, revealing himself in his angelic glories of natural knowledge, natural beauty, natural wisdom, and natural humanity." Thus does he play his part in this last age! Under these radiant disguises he is bewildering the eyes of men, and persuading them that this diffusion of knowledge is the appearing of the Millennial dawn. So specious are his counterfeits that it is hard to separate the real from the false, the precious from the vile; for when he thus comes forth as an angel of light, clothed in every perfection that the natural heart loves and the carnal eye admires, who shall penetrate the deception and escape the snare save those who "know all things," by reason of "the unction from the Holy One?" (1 John 2 : 20). Most truly has the present state of the world been described by one of the world's own poets, when picturing the gay glitter of an evening assembly, over which was thrown

"A dazzling mass of artificial light, Which showed all things, but nothing as they were."

So it is now upon the earth, among the heedless multitudes of the children of men. It is the world's midnight. They are eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage. Literature, science, art, philosophy, are all their own! Yet there is an artificial coloring, an unreal brightness, over all. There is music, but it is of the syren kind. There is eloquence, too, but it is "the words of man's wisdom," not that which speaks for God and "winneth souls." There is fervor, too, but it is the warmth of wild excitement, born in novelty and nursed by perpetual change. There is high thought, too, but it is often of the unhealthful cast, wrought off at the midnight lamp; not the deep musings begot in fellowship with God, and ceaseless converse with that inspired word which maketh wise the simple. And, in connection with all this, there is a proud air of independence, like that which said, "Our lips are our own; who is Lord over us?" There is a reckless determination to hold what opinions men please, unchecked and unreproved.

8. The maturity of

THE PAPAL ANTICHRIST.

Popery itself is no new thing on earth, so that its mere existence is no peculiar sign of the last day. But its progress and prevalence are entirely new. There is a maturity about it which, in other ages, it could not claim. It is rising in stature and fast hastening to its consummation. In extent of circle she stretches far beyond the territories of other days. In all regions of the earth she is planting her banner and claiming dominion over the nations. Never did she show herself more thoroughly in earnest. She is flinging her chains across the globe. With stealthy foot she has been advancing step by step, till now she walks abroad at noonday with the sound of the trumpet, lifting up her head in bold defiance. Her hand, like Amalek's, is "upon the throne of the Lord;" and she acts and speaks as if in nothing she would be restrained of all that she has imagined to do.*

Never since the Reformation has popery made so deadly and determined a struggle for the recovery of throne and altar. Hundreds of missionary priests are thrusting themselves into every corner, winding themselves into the confidence of the influential, and insinuating themselves with serpent-stealth and subtlety into all seats of power. They mark off their districts and rear their churches everywhere, carrying on their work of proselytism at any expense and by every method. They build with costly splendor; they adorn with most attractive grace; they cast the net with consummate art, that beneath its ample stretch they may entangle the thousands of every age and class and temper who love a theatrical religion, that will gratify the carnal sense, and furnish men with a license for the commission of any amount of iniquity. They talk proudly, too, and boast openly of their success, casting off the mask of meekness and modesty which they had in some measure assumed, proclaiming loudly that, as no heresy was ever allowed more than a duration of three centuries, the British apostasy has now reached its close. Thus they prophesy of their own speedy triumph, and of our hastening doom.

It is not my part either to confirm or to confute the prophecy. A few years will unfold it all. There may be darker days in reserve for Britain, than many will believe. Her day has been long bright, her sky long cloudless. What nation has ever enjoyed a century of such profound tranquillity as we have experienced, unbroken save by a few political commotions, or a few murmurs of fretful discontent? The cup of trembling, which was put into the hands and pressed to the lips of every nation in Europe, in 1793–1815, passed us by. The revolutionary earthquake shocks that have during this century successively laid waste every kingdom around us, convulsing nations and overturning thrones, tearing up a thousand hearths, and agitating ten thousand fearful bosoms with alternate despair and hope, reached us not, nor stirred even one ripple on our sea-bound shore.

When Providence raised up

as the scourge of the Papal empires; when He called Him to His foot, gave the nations before him, and made him ruler over kings, giving them as dust to his sword and as driven stubble to his bow, He appointed him his bounds that he could not pass over, and we were preserved, unmolested and secure. When every capital in Europe was in flames, from Moscow to Madrid, we were sitting each man under his own vine and fig-tree, with none to make us afraid. The enemy, with the vanquished might of Europe in his train, prepared to overwhelm us: he threatened, boasted, numbered his armies, talked of a second Armada; but in vain! We were secure. We needed "no bulwarks, no towers along the steep." We were Protestant, and therefore invincible. Our protest was our palladium. From our far-off lonely island there went forth upon the earth the solitary voice that testified for Christ against Antichrist, in the midst of a world of idolatry and darkness. God heard the testimony, and He blessed the witness!

But since that time what has taken place? We have laid aside our protest as too bigoted for an enlightened age like ours. We have struck our Protestant colors, and hung out the flag of neutrality; or rather, we should say, of religious indifference. With our own hands we have taken down the old ancestral standard which has braved three centuries of storm, allowing the spoiler to tear in pieces and trample under foot the inheritance of our fathers, the birthright of our sons; proclaiming to the world that our past protest was a stain upon our history, and that it matters nothing to a nation's well-being whether the Bible or the Koran be the basis of her statute-book, or whether the national ensign be surmounted by the cross, the crescent, or the triple crown. We have little reason to hope that we shall ride out another storm as we have done the last. The anchor of our national Protestant testimony is gone!

(To be concluded.)

One Hundred Dollars was the Total Expense of Mr. McCarthy, of the China Inland Mission, making a missionary journey of 3000 miles, right across China to Burmah, accompanied by a native catechist and two coolies. This was the total cost of the food of the missionary party of four persons during an evangelizing tour which lasted no less than eight months. The standing reproach of the professing Church of Christ is a disobedient and cruel neglect of the heathen world—a want of large-heartedness on the part of many wealthy Christians, who could if they would supply in a single week all that is required to send to the heathen all who are ready to go to the work to which God has called them.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Gen. Garfield's Opinion in Reference to a Permanent civil service was expressed in his reply to a deputation from the Independent Republican Association of New York, which called upon him November 26th. A leading principle of the programme of the association is that the only test a candidate for a subordinate appointment under Government should undergo is that of ability, and that, having obtained the appointment, he should not be discharged except for misconduct. The association believes that such a regulation would eliminate from the quadrennial Presidential struggle its most agitating element, and would tend to promote the efficiency of the public service. Having expressed this belief to the President-elect, he said in reply that he hoped to have the co-operation of Congress in establishing a legal basis for all routine appointments, so that it should not be in the power of anybody, even the President, to remove any capable and faithful appointee during his term of office, whether the term be long or short. The delegation were gratified by General Garfield's personal approval of their principles, but those who know most about the ways of Congress are not sanguine in hoping for its co-operation.

The Position Occupied by Ex-Presidents of the United States has formed a prominent topic in journalism since the excitement of the Presidential election subsided. Influential journals represent that a citizen who has once held the highest position it is in the power of the people to confer cannot return to the ordinary avocations of life at the close of his Presidential term, without compromising both his own dignity and that of the nation. Two plans have been proposed to avert this difficulty. The first is to make every ex-President a Senator for life with a Senator's salary; either as Senator at large or as representing the District of Columbia, which at present has no Senator. The second proposal is to establish a fund, either by grant from the National Treasury or by a popular subscription; this fund to be invested, and the annual income derived from it to be enjoyed by the oldest living ex-President. The New York Times has taken the lead in advocating the latter scheme, and a few wealthy citizens have written that journal offering various sums to forward the object. The promises given so far amount to $15,351, but the subscribers hope the fund will ultimately reach a total of $300,000.

The Continued Prosperity of the South under the administration of General Garfield is predicted by many organs of the Southern press. The Vicksburg (Miss.) Herald, in commenting on the situation remarks that notwithstanding the circumstances of President Hayes's advent to power, the South has made rapid progress under the policy he has adopted during his term of office, and that "it is hardly possible that General Garfield will make any radical changes in a policy that is proved to be successful. The great commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests, North and South, certainly do not expect any change. Mr. Garfield owes his election more to the cry of his followers 'that the country is doing well, and it is wisdom to let well enough alone,' than to any other cause. It is therefore unwise for the South to distress itself with fears of disaster as a consequence of Republican success."

Gov. St. John, of Kansas, in the Course of an interesting letter, says, in reference to the Prohibition Amendment carried at the last election: "The liquor-dealers in and outside of Kansas expended large sums of money in trying to defeat the measure, but the people, without money, but with God on their side, crowned it with a good majority. It was not considered in any sense a partisan question, men of all parties supporting and opposing it. The amendment was the result of a movement by a large body of our people, who believe that intoxicating liquor, when used as a beverage, never brought a blessing to any human being, and that misery, poverty, and crime are its legitimate fruits. My open advocacy of the amendment and of the cause of temperance no doubt cost me some votes, but it was not votes for myself so much as the principle involved that I deemed important to our people. Any man can afford to lose votes if he is only right, but no man can afford to gain them by being wrong."

Two New Treaties have been Concluded between the American commissioners and the Chinese Government. The provisions of the treaties have not been published, and the telegraphic summary sent home by the commissioners is not sufficiently complete to convey a clear idea of the effect of the negotiations. It is, however, understood that both the emigration and commercial questions have been settled in a way that will command the approval of our citizens, even of the extremists on the Pacific coast.

The Withdrawal of the Passion Play is Announced in a letter addressed by Mr. Abbey to the press. The manager, having stated the reasons which prompted him to entertain the project of producing the play, says: "I feel that I have no right to set my single opinion against that of an almost entire community, and thus to outrage any sentiment they may possess, no matter how unjust I may consider the existence of such sentiment to be. I have therefore concluded not to produce or give any representation whatever of the Passion Play." It is understood that Mr. Abbey will lose $20,000 by breaking his contract, but he said to a reporter, after the announcement had been made, that he felt it would be "a relief to be rid of the tremendous avalanche of denunciation that overwhelmed him day and night." It is remarkable that even the Jewish press and the Jewish rabbis of the city joined in the general condemnation of the project, and with the exception of the newspapers said to be under the control of Mr. John Kelly, all the secular journals were opposed to it.

The Death of Rev. Stephen M. Vail, D.D., occurred at Jersey City November 26th. Dr. Vail was regarded as one of the most prominent leaders of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was born in 1817 at La Grange, Dutchess County, N. Y. His early years were marked by rapid intellectual progress, and after his conversion and call to the ministry he gained a high reputation for his theological learning. In 1847 Dr. Vail was elected President of the seminary at Pennington, N. J., a position he resigned to become Professor of Languages in the Concord Theological School. This position he held for eighteen years, when his health failed, and he retired for a time from activ labor. During his retirement his pen was bus and some articles he wrote attracted the notic of General Grant, who gave him a consular appointment in Bavaria, which he held until 1874 when he returned to his home in Staten Islan Dr. Vail was the author of several importan works, prominent among which are "Life i Earnest" and "Ministerial Education."

The Agitation in Ireland Increases as th time for trying the leaders of the Land Leagu approaches. The date of the trial is now fixe for December 28th, and an energetic effort i being made to raise the $50,000 the League considers necessary to pay the expenses of the defence

The harvesting on Mr. Boycott's farm has bee completed, and the soldiers employed to protec the laborers engaged have conducted Mr. Boycot and his family to a place of safety. Many othe persons have been subjected to the process of excommunication employed against Mr. Boycott, mor than eighty gentlemen in Ireland being now unde the constant protection of the police.

Parliament is expected to assemble on Januar 6th, when the plan the Government has adopted fo dealing with the Irish difficulty will be introduced It is understood that the dissensions in the Cabine have been compromised by an arrangement that n extraordinary repressive measures shall be propose unless a crisis should occur before the meeting o Parliament. The Land Bill is expected to be comprehensive measure, designed to permanentl settle the vexed question, but it is difficult to understand how Mr. Gladstone can hope to obtain th assent of the House of Lords to a scheme whic would satisfy the Land League.

Dulcigno has at Length been Formall surrendered to Montenegro. The little seaport, s long the centre of European interest, was occupie by its new masters at midnight on Friday, November 26th. The Sultan had delayed the cessio as long as he was able, and will now enter on th Greek difficulty. Earl Granville, the British Foreign Minister, in a speech delivered November 27th said that on the Eastern Question England wa acting in concert with the other Great Powers o Europe, and the report that the union had broke down was untrue. "The European concert," h said, "exists at this moment," and he hoped i would long continue.

An Anti-Jewish Crusade has been Commenced in Germany. An effort is being made b an influential party in the German Parliament t pass a law excluding Jews from office. The movement is believed to have the sanction if not to hav been prompted by Prince Bismarck. The leader of the anti-Jewish party allege that Jews from Poland and other countries, who have no intention o becoming German citizens, have arrived in larg numbers, and are monopolizing the business o bankers and brokers, and are amassing large fortunes to be carried out of Germany. Considerabl agitation has been caused by the movement.

Out of Print.—In Answer to Several Applications notice is here given that we have no more bound volumes or single numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD prior to July, 1879, for disposal.

Bible and Prayer Union.—The Lessons for the ensuing week are the consecutive Psalms, that for to-morrow, Dec. 3. being Psalm 123. The following requests for prayer have been received: From a minister for whom prayer was asked in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who now desires that Praise be offered for the answer to those prayers which he has received—For the conversion of a drinking man—From a lady in Canada, that she may be quickened in the Spiritual Life—From a minister who is becoming worldly-minded, that he may have more of the Spirit of Christ.

The Peroration of Dr. Talmage's Sermon on Thanksgiving Day was a splendid summing up of the causes for the nation's gratitude. The preacher said that the product of corn in the United States this year was 2,000,000,000 bushels, worth $600,-000,000; the wheat product, 500,000,000 bushels; petroleum, 15,000,000 barrels; 16,000,000 swine; exports of beef, lard and bacon, $87,000,000; exports of breadstuffs, $279,000,000; exports of otton, petroleum, and tobacco, $745,000,000. He escribed the immense Dalrymple farm, which ielded 32,000 bushels of wheat this year, and other xtensive farms, of from 10,000 to 15,000 acres ach, and said that we had only begun to till the il in this country, and that our productions were ready limited by facilities for transportation. Four undred and fifty-five thousand emigrants had come enrich the country this year, and it was immigra-on of a kind that was never equalled—brains and apital.

A Christian Politician's Thankoffering was ade a few days ago. The officers of the American oard of Foreign Missions received a visit from a ranger who walked into their office and counted ut two thousand dollars, which he gave to the easurer, remarking that he wished to give some pression to his thankfulness for the election of eneral Garfield. He refused to tell his name.

An Antiquary's Disappointment, Narrated a European journal, amusingly illustrates the stakes into which scientific men sometimes fall. German professor in one of his exploring tours scovered in the wall of an old farm-house a ne bearing the date 1081. He was anxious to ssess so interesting a relic, and purchased it of farmer for the high price of forty guilders. hen delivered at the professor's house, the date the stone read 1801, and the savant refused to e it, alleging that it was not the stone he had ught. But inquiry proved that it was, and the or had been caused by the masons having inserted it in the wall upside down. It is probable that ne of the scientific facts with which learned men leavor to overthrow the Bible records are capable n explanation equally simple. (1 Tim. 6 : 20).

Desperate Fight for Life with a Bear Oc- red in a cave in Pike County, Pa. The details given in the Philadelphia Times under date of vember 24th. It appears that Jerry Greening, nter well known in Pike County, while hunt- in the woods a few days ago entered a cave. cave was very dark, and he made a torch of a knot; then he saw that a ferocious she-bear and cubs were also inside the cave. He barely saw n before the bear sprang upon him, wounding shoulder and extinguishing the torch. Then menced a desperate struggle; the hunter could find his rifle in the dark, and his only weapon his knife, but with that he wounded the bear everely that she let go her hold and made for nouth of the cave. The hunter, covered with d—his own and that of the bear—followed her killed her; but he was so exhausted by the ggle that he lay for some time unconscious. desperate fight recalls the figures under h Bunyan typifies the struggles of the Chris- life.

Man with a Telescope Eye is Now Living attle Creek, Mich. His name is Guelph, he is thirty-two years of age. A corre- dent of the Boston Herald, describing the ge phenomenon, says that until recently ph's powers of vision were like those of people, but while walking in the woods a sapling suddenly released, struck him s the right eye, causing acute pain. It was d he would lose the sight of the organ, and me weeks he wore a bandage over it. One hile Guelph was out in the fields the ban- slipped off, and then he became conscious of arkable change in the aspect of the scene. use he knew to be nearly a mile away ap- d to be close at hand, and he was able to nd minutely describe a builder at work on l whom those near him could scarcely see. werful field glass was procured, and it was that Guelph's description was accurate; other experiments proved that he could see as well without the glass as other people could see with it. The lens of the eye had been so compressed by this accident as to render it telescopic in power. Much curiosity has been excited by the peculiarity; but Guelph replies to congratulations by saying that he would prefer having his eye as it was before, for it bewilders him, and is useless in looking at anything close at hand, and he is being continually deceived as to the position. His experience is like that of people who seek to penetrate the future by the aid of Spiritualists and fortune-tellers. The knowledge they obtain is generally deceptive and always useless. He alone is the happy man who does his duty in the present and leaves the future in the hand of his God, knowing that all things will work together for good to those who love Him (Rom. 8 : 28).

Seasonable Benevolence.—Mr. Moody Suggested to Northfield (Mass.) farmers two years ago to send apples to Boston for distribution among the poor, which they did. The suggestion was also adopted by farmers in several towns this season, and the City Mission has already had about 1000 bushels to distribute.

A Monster of the Deep Cast Up by the Sea on the Duggerna Reef, County Clare, Ireland, during the last great storm on October 7th, is described in a letter to the London Globe by the Rev. R. I. Gabbett. It was a gigantic octopus, which is known as "the devil-fish," from the immense strength with which it seizes and holds its prey. Its tentacles, of which there were eight, were each fifteen feet long, and as thick as a man's arm, and studded underneath throughout the whole length with a double row of rounded suckers. The head was three feet long, and its hideous eyes were like the inner surface of a breakfast plate, while its repulsive mouth, shaped like a parrot's beak, was as large and baggy as the joined hands of a man with fingers outstretched. The horrid creature weighed nearly a quarter of a ton. To come in contact with such a creature in the depths of the sea must have been certain death. It is appropriately named, for those who have tried in their own strength to escape from the power of Satan know how utterly futile have been their most determined efforts. Not until He to whom "all power is given" came to the rescue was deliverance achieved (Luke 10 : 17-18).

A Mother's Portrait Displayed on the Wall of a dance-house in New York was the means of rescuing her daughter from a life of sin. The mother had ascertained that the girl had come from her home in a distant State to this city, and she sought her vainly for several days. She was advised to visit a well-known dance-house, and went there. Her poignant distress touched the callous heart of the proprietor, and he suggested that as the mother did not know the name her daughter had assumed, and had no portrait of her, that she should hang her own portrait on his wall, with a few words written underneath. The plan was adopted, and it had not remained there long before one of the frequenters of the place, on looking at it, fell back fainting. But the words traced by the mother's hand were words of encouragement and promised pardon, and the prodigal trusting them went home to be received with open arms. Of all those who have trusted God's promise of pardon through Jesus and have gone to Him in faith, not one has been cast out (John 6 : 37).

The Celebration of John Wycliffe's Achievement of translating the Bible from the Latin to the English, completed five hundred years ago, is to be observed this evening at the Academy of Music, New York. The managers of the American Bible Society have appropriately taken the matter in hand, and the Rev. Richard S. Storrs, D.D., LL.D., has consented to deliver the principal address. The part Wycliffe took in hastening on the reformation, and the glorious results which followed his work of Bible translation, ought never to be forgotten; and as this subject is now prominent before the Christian world, we shall give in the next number of The Christian Herald a portrait of Wycliffe and a sketch of his life.

"Then spake the Lord to Paul in the night by a vision, Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace: for I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city."—Act 18 : 9, 10.

It is clear from this, dear friends, that even he who was not a whit behind the chief of the apostles sometimes needed special comfort. It is possible that even the bravest of the brave may be afraid. Sinking of heart assailed even Samson while as yet the thousand slain lay in heaps around him. Moses was cast down in the desert, and David on the throne. Even iron will melt, much more a heart of flesh. Remember the faintness of Elijah when he said, "Let me die, I am no better than my fathers," and recollect that this was a lion-like man, one of those ministers of God who are as a flame of fire. The second Elias, he who rebuked Herod to his face, was sadly staggered while he lay in prison; John the Baptist sent to Jesus to inquire, "Art thou he that should come?"

No doubt those heroes who have fought the battle of the truth, and have driven back its adversaries, have been men of like passions with us, and some of them of more than ordinary sensitiveness of feeling. Luther said, "Because I seem to be always strong and merry, men think that I walk on a bed of roses; but God knows how it is with me." Perhaps no man ever experienced such mighty joys and such tremendous despairs as did that mighty man, who shook the papacy to its foundation. Even Paul was not without his tendency to fear. He writes in one of his epistles: "When we were come into Macedonia, our flesh had no rest, but we were troubled on every side; without were fightings, within were fears."

Do not think, therefore, my dear brother or sister, if in working for Christ you get thoroughly cast down and sick of yourself, that you are undergoing an experience unknown to the sons of God. It is by no means so. Trembling takes hold on all in turns; faintness is common enough on all hands. Fear, like the mist of the valley, steals over the very garden of the Lord, and there is not a flower in all the borders which is not at times bowed down with the weight of the chilly damp.

But the Lord took care to visit His servant when he was in a measure of trouble, or afraid of being so. He came to him in the visions of the night. We do not expect to see the Lord Jesus Christ in visions now, for "we have a more sure word of prophecy to which we do well to take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place"—we have the word of God, inspired and infallible. We have the whole of the divinely written roll; we can read it when we will, and from its page God speaks with a clear and certain voice.

GOD IS ALWAYS APPEARING to you who have believing eyes. God is never silent until we are deaf. He speaks to us morning by morning, and He has precept upon precept for the quiet hours of eventide. The Lord did but appear to Paul during one night, for visions are short and few; but any night you like to wake and open the Scriptures, and seek for the power of the Spirit to rest upon them.

you shall hear Jesus speaking to you ; and any day you turn to that passage in Isaiah, you shall hear the very words that Jesus spoke to Paul, "Fear not, I am with thee," with these additional words, "I am thy God. When thou goest through the fire, thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."

Besides, visions and such like things belong to the infancy of the Church : now that she has grown strong, she exercises a grander faith in God, and needs not that the Invisible should be supplemented by signs and wonders. If you plant a tree in an orchard, it is very common to put a big stake by the side of it to hold it up. Nobody thinks of putting a post to support an apple-tree which has been there for the last fifty years. In fact, it could hold the stake rather than borrow support from it. When a ship leaves the docks and passes down the river, you will see it towed out till it reaches the sea ; but that same vessel will by and by spread all her sails, and with a heavenly breeze to bear her along she will need no tug to tow her to the desired haven.

The Church of God to-day is a tree that needs no support of miracle and vision, a vessel that has braved two thousand years the battle and the breeze, and will still, till Christ cometh, outride every storm. At this time, O servants of Jesus, you have the word of God, which is better than visions. Oh that now the Lord Jesus would take of His own Word, and by His Spirit speak it home to all who love Him ; then will they be as much refreshed as though they were in Patmos with the beloved disciple.

I. First, brethren, notice briefly

THE TENDENCY OF OUR WEAKNESS.

That tendency is revealed in the first word—"Be not afraid." We feel, when we newly find Christ, that we must speak for Jesus, and we do so ; but after a while a foolish fear freezes many a tongue, and keeps many a lip silent that ought to be telling out the wondrous story of redeeming love. We get to be afraid. We are not nowadays afraid, as the first Christians might have been, of the amphitheatre and the lions, or of Nero and his sword. Happily we are delivered from almost all open persecution ; but there are other things which evidently frighten a good many.

For instance, some are afraid to speak for Jesus because of the defects of their education. They fancy that, when educated persons are present, if they say anything for Christ they will make a mistake in grammar or mispronounce a word, and the very learned folks will discover their ignorance, and set them down for dunces. I have heard a young preacher say that, in his early days, when he saw a gentleman with a white cravat come into the village chapel, he felt that he could not preach. Something very dreadful about that, no doubt !

Somebody from London has entered the cottage where the dear brother has been trying to talk about Christ, and he is in a cold sweat, he hardly knows why. The stranger has a respectable black coat on, and is very different from the agricultural laborers who make up the usual congregation, and for fear of him the champion of the cross is quaking. Do you not notice that the good brother's voice has undergone a serious toning down ? He cannot speak with freedom, and yet, if he only knew it, his best friend in the whole congregation is that well-dressed stranger. He is afraid of a brother who would best sympathize with him and most earnestly pray for him -the very brother who would encourage him most if they could have a half-hour's talk together.

If we can declare the Gospel in a masterly manner, by all means let us do it, but if we are slow of speech and uncouth in utterance, let not these things silence us. Was not Moses slow of utterance ? Was he silent ? Did not Isaiah own that his lips were unfit to deliver the message ? Was he therefore idle ? If a man is learned and educated, let him reckon that his learning should help him to simplicity ; and if he is not educated, let him talk about Jesus Christ in his own way, with the words that come freshest from his own heart, and let him never be afraid.

I have known others fearful, on the other hand, because they have not gathered educated people to listen to them, but are surrounded by a rough lot, whose manners and habits distress them. Sensitive Christians have shrunk from speaking to such characters, for they said, "Ah, they will turn it all to ridicule, and we must not throw pearls before swine." Brother, are you quite sure that you have any pearls, and are you quite sure that the people are swine ? I generally feel as if what I had to say was not so pearly that I need be alarmed about the swine treading on it ; and, also, I have felt concerning my congregation that, as they have immortal souls, there is a somewhat about them which differences them from swine ; and who am I, to be so particular about the reception which men give to my words ? Christ spake even to those who refused Him, and shall not I do the same ? Our Saviour did not mean by that expression what you think He did. Some parts of our experience are choice as pearls, and these we may only tell to God's own people, and not to those who cannot appreciate them ; but, as to the Gospel, preach it before all the swine that ever can be gathered together, for to such is it sent.

Brethren in Christ, it is your business, whoever may be around you, still to tell out what Jesus Christ has done for you. "But they would laugh at it." Well, well, there are worse things than that in the world. Making people laugh is not the worst thing than can be done. I would sooner increase mirth in the world than sorrow. If I made men's hearts ache about nothing, as our novelists often do, I would throw away my pen, and hold my tongue ; but if, in consequence of some awkwardness or eccentricity, people smile at me—well, if they are the happier, it cannot hurt me.

Oh, be content to take a little of the rough with the smooth for your Master's sake. Some hearts cannot be got at until, first of all, they feel a keen aversion to what they hear. Better that they should rave with wrath than feel nothing. We must get the oyster open somehow, and if this may be done by a tempting bait as well as by sheer force, then let us try

THE GENTLE EXPERIMENT.

We have known brethren who have trembled at the slightest degree of publicity. They are tender souls, and do not like to be seen. I would not harshly condemn all, for certain minds are quiet and timid, and must be allowed to do good by stealth. But I cannot thus excuse all, for some are blamably deficient in courage. There is a beautiful modesty about them ; but I would have them recollect that modesty is not all the virtues, nor can it be a substitute for them. The soldier who was so very modest that he retired before the battle, I have heard say, was shot. And as for Christian people who are so very modest that they get out of the way of everything that is to be done for Christ, I do not know how they will answer for it to their superior Officer at the last.

"Oh, but I am naturally timid," says one. It is to you, then, that the Lord's word is addressed : "Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not." I have heard, and I think I have observed, that the bravest men in the hour of danger are timid in the prospect of it. They say that a fire-eater who dashes to the battle is often the man who fails ; but he who stands trembling at the first shot, in his inmost soul dreading death, is, nevertheless, the very man to act the hero's part if he is so overpowered by a stern sense of duty that he masters fear and steadily keeps his position with cool, immovable resolve.

"The brave man is not he who feels no fear,
For that were stupid and irrational ;
But he whose noble soul its fear subdues,
And bravely dares the danger nature shrinks from."

Up, then, ye tremblers, and play the man. In the matter of speaking for Jesus, this should not be a severe ordeal. Oh, do not, I pray you, let timidity so check you that you cannot speak a word to your own children- cannot pray with your own girl, cannot plead as a father with your own boy, cannot speak as a neighbor or a fellow-workman to the man who works side by side with you at the bench. May God help you to get out of the cold shade of cowardice, for the text says, "Be not afraid."

Still, I hear you say, "I am afraid to speak out for religion because I should bring down upon myself a world of opposition at home." That is painful, my dear friend, but though painful it is a part of the cost which you reckoned upon when you took up the cross to follow Jesus. It is a part of the cost that "a man's foes shall be they of his own household." "The brother shall deliver up the brother to death, and the father the child," says Christ. It was so in old times ; it is so now. It is terrible to think of what some young people have had to suffer for being faithful to their convictions ; but when we consider that it is all for Jesus' sake, happy are they who are honored to endure on that account !

Now, I charge every Christian here to be speaking boldly in Christ's name, according as he has opportunity, and especially to take care of this tendency of our flesh to be afraid, which leads practically to endeavors to get off easily and save ourselves from trouble. Fear not ; be brave for Christ. Live bravely for Him who died lovingly for you.

II. Come we now to the second point—and this we will also speak upon briefly—it is

THE CALLING OF OUR FAITH.

Why ought those that believe in Christ t speak for Him ?

1. I answer, first, because, brethren, we ar debtors ; we are put in trust with the Gospel fo other people ; let us not be false to our trusteeship, but faithful stewards of the mysteries o God.

Paul says, "I am debtor, both to the Greek and to the Barbarians, both to the wise and t the unwise." We owe something to every ma that lives. "Oh," says one, "I do not se that." But hath not the Lord said, "Tho shalt love thy neighbor as thyself ?" That is word of very wide range, for every human bein is your neighbor. The Samaritan was neighbc to the Jew ; the Roman Catholic is neighbor t the Protestant ; the Mahometan is neighbor t the Christian ; and the heathen is neighbor t us all.

You never pass "a heathen Chinee" or a Zul in the street without owing him something, a cording as you have an opportunity to do hi good. We are all of us of one family, and, b cause of the tie of the one blood, there is a det of brotherhood from all who are enlightened t those who are yet in darkness. Who can te what we owe to Christ ? He seems to say, "P it back to my brethren. If ye love me, feed m sheep, feed my lambs. If you want to do goo to me, do good to mine. Bring in those that have redeemed with blood ; for this is the be reward you can give me for having laid down m life for you." You are a keeper of the gosp oracles, my brother ; take care, then, that yo speak, and are not silent.

2. But, next, you and I were saved by who spoke to us personally. I owe a great de of my being brought to Christ to my parents, whom I would always be grateful for their spir ual care of me ; and as a parent I am to rep that obligation by teaching my own children. owe very much to a very excellent teacher in dav school. I did try, when I personally taug children, to pay back my teacher by teachi others. I owed still more to such men as Baxt and Bunyan, who left their books fo- me read. I have tried to write earnest books, th I may recompense as well as I can the Church God for the loan which it made to me in th direction. Most of all I owe my decisic under God, to a man I never knew, who hu bly and simply preached Christ crucified to m and I would desire to be always preaching Chr ucified to others, as the best way of making ome sort of return. We are debtors to the hurch of God, and let us repay the boon. We hall be shamefully ungrateful unless we do this.

3. Besides, it seems to me that lls upon every Christian to seek the salvation others. They are perishing! Will you let em perish? "God have mercy on them," say u? Yes. Is that all? Have you nothing but at hurried prayer to give them? "Be ye armed; be ye filled," ye say to the hungry, d ye fill them not from your own stores. d's curse will light on such inhuman conduct. is ours to labor by pleadings and entreaties to atch our infatuated neighbors from the fiery ve which will soon overwhelm impenitent ners, and if we do not earnestly seek them y shall perish, but their blood will God re- ire at the watchman's hands. He has set h one of His people to take a part of the tch for the souls of men. Are we awake at post? Oh, see ye well to this, I pray you, h man, each woman, for himself or herself! ve love God we must love our brother also. he Gospel has saved us, we must wish to see ers saved. Unless we are hypocritical alto- her, we must burn with strong desire to bring ers to the Saviour.

would to God that He would call out to nself a troop of valiant ones at this good e. I feel somewhat at this hour in thinking ut London as Farel did when he met with vin. Calvin was yet a young man. He had ten his famous "Institutes," and Farel, at eva, saw what mental force there was in . Here is the story from Bungener:

Farel, alike humble and courageous, had n asked if another would not succeed better he, and a sort of presentiment had bidden wait in hope of such a man. Calvin was illing to undertake the work; he was not e, he said, for such an office. He asked that ight be left in obscurity to busy himself in ies; for it was only thus he could be of any e. Then Farel broke out, 'Thy studies are etext; I tell thee that if thou refusest to as- ate thyself with my work, God will curse for having sought thyself and not Christ.' in yielded to God and not to man; and the ever remained dear and venerable in his ."

vin was henceforth prompt and sincere in the of the Lord, even when his body was tortured diseases and worn down with pain. Would I might find some such man here who d this day hearken to the voice saying to "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy e."

. But now, thirdly,

r service. Let us dwell on that a little . "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not eace, for I am with thee."

ere is the first encouragement—God's pres- "I am with thee." When a man speaks od, God speaks in him. We never go a re for God at our own charges: He is sure with the man who is with Him. If thou st thyself, thou wilt run without God; if desirest honor among men, thou shalt have nor from God; but if thy heart be set upon essing of thy fellow-men, and the extension Redeemer's kingdom, God is with thee. ver was away from any man who sought ss, virtue, and eternal life. What cause, can there be for fear? If God be with who can be against thee?

next consolation is God's protection. "No hall set on thee to hurt thee." The Jews ed Paul before the judgment-seat of Gallio, aul must have been amazed when he saw rsecutors themselves beaten. The great knew how to protect his own ambassador. men meddle with one of God's burning ining lights they will sooner or later burn wn fingers. There is a disposition about ngodly men to fly at Christian ministers gnats do at candles, and they generally meet with the gnats' fate. The protection of God should be a constant fountain of comfort to God's people.

The last comfort is God's predestination. Predestination is an ugly word to some people, but I cannot help that. Here is the doctrine in the text: "I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee, for I have much people in this city;" that is to say, many who belonged to Christ, though they were as yet heathens. The Lord does not speak of those who were converted. Paul did not need a revelation in the night to tell him that God had much people in that city, if by that was meant the persons who professed faith in Christ, for he knew all about them; night and day had He watched over them. But God knew that He had an elect people in Corinth whom he must save—a redeemed people that Christ specially bought from among men to be His people, of whom the Lord had said, "Other sheep have I that are not yet of this flock." Paul was cheered by the good news that God had many chosen and redeemed ones in Corinth, whom he must save.

I learn from this that the doctrine of Gods' predestination is no check to labor. "If there are so many that will be saved," says one, "then why do you preach?" That is why we do preach. If there are so many fish to be taken in the net, I will go and catch some of them. Because many are ordained to be caught, I spread my nets with eager expectation. I never could see why that should repress our zealous efforts; it seems to me to be the very thing that should awaken us to energy—that God has a people, and that these people shall be brought in. Why, it nerves me to labor when I remember that His word shall not return void; it shall prosper in the thing whereto He has sent it.

The next thing we learn is that the certainty of success should be a great stimulus to us. That is why the Lord said to Paul, "I have much people in this city." You and I are bound to preach the Gospel, even if never a soul were converted by it; for the great object of the Gospel is the glory of God, and God is glorified even in those who reject the Gospel.

But, next, we see very clearly that are quite sufficient to save souls. Our Lord did not say, "Paul, be not afraid, but deliver a Sunday afternoon lecture with a nonsensical title and little or no Gospel in it." No, no; but, "Speak, and hold not thy peace, for I have much people in this city." God's way of saving souls is the best way, after all. You and I may get up all sorts of inventions, and He may wink at our follies, and let us go on with them, but His way of saving souls is speaking the Gospel, and nothing other than the Gospel.

I should like to see in the world again a revival like that under Jonathan Edwards, in which there were no extravagances, no utterances of false doctrine, no making a noise and a riot, but just the preaching of the old-fashioned doctrines of grace. Those truths brought on a revival of a deep and enduring kind. Men were filled with an awful fear of God, and they repented bitterly, and mended their ways and sought to find Jesus in dreadful earnest, and rested not till they found Him. They did not sing jigs, but they wept as one that is in bitterness for her first-born. They flaunted no banners, but they laid hold on Jesus in the secret of their souls. They did not often shout, but they went home and talked one to another of what God had been doing in their souls, and they lived near to Him. I would like to see that old kind of work and life among us again.

Once again, dear friends, usefulness, according to the text, is the best protection a man can have. Notice that. "No man shall set on thee to hurt thee, for I have much people in this city." When God means to save people by any man, that man will live till the chosen are ingathered He may go to sea, but storms cannot drown him; he may be waylaid by ungodly men, but robbers cannot hurt him; he is immortal till his work is done. Men of God have gone into fever lairs, using all care and precaution, and they have been protected from the pestilence.

It has happened that Christian men have been in perils by robbers, perils by false brethren, perils everywhere, but they have survived all, and triumphed in all; and when they have not been thus upheld it may have been because their ministry was ended. They went home because their day's work was over. Where should they go else? They went back to their Father, for their Father had no more need of them abroad. As long as God has anything for you to do, nothing will ever kill you, my brother. Go ahead, and fear not. "I have much people in this city;" go thou to win them, and thou shalt be safe.

I believe that our position at this time is very much that of Paul; for we, too, hope, trust, and believe that God has much people in this city. What a city it is! Not one among us has any idea of

THE SIZE OF LONDON.

You shall go to-day to a well-remembered spot and find yourself on a sudden in a region which you never saw before—a township which has sprung up in a night. I remember an old oak tree, and a pond with geese, and cowslips growing in the meadow. It is a mile in town at the present moment, and the tree is gone, and everything about it. Instead of a hedgerow, I sigh to see an endless wilderness of brown stucco.

Oh, this great city! It grows at an awful rate, but God has much people in it, depend upon it. I believe in London. God means to bless it largely. You will say, "Why?" Well, I look back upon its past history, and I have hope. The martyrs' blood lies here. When all the country was yielding its martyrs, London furnished its full share. On this very spot where we now are, three were burnt for the truth's sake; old chronicles say, "At the Butts at Newington, three Anabaptists were burnt." These were among the earliest of martyrs, before Protestants were known or thought of. Always were Anabaptists a prey, and they who killed them thought they did God service. Members of our ancient persecuted Church were often in London burnt for the truth's sake and for Christ's sake, and from the ground their blood is calling still.

I feel sure that God will bless London yet, because at this very moment, if the Gospel is preached so that people can understand it, they will throng to hear it. Alas! poor men cannot understand half the preachers. They preach Latin fit for drawing-rooms. If they would go to Billingsgate and learn English, they might get on. You say, "That would be very rough English!" Well, but the roughest of English might be better than the Latinized jargon of most of our pulpits. When men preach the Gospel plainly and simply they will never lack a congregation in this great city, I am certain of it.

Away in a back street, down in a hollow way just beyond Barclay & Perkins's brewery, where there are no cabs or other public conveyances, right out of the world and into the mud, the crowds came and found out a boy years ago, and they followed him because he preached the Gospel in a way which they could understand. They will find a man out anywhere if he will but preach the Gospel of Christ.

I am sure that the Lord has much people in this city, because there is a hungering and thirsting after the Gospel, if they could but get at it. Go ahead, then, brothers and sisters. Talk about Christ. Talk about Him everywhere. Talk about Him in the workshop. Speak about Him quietly and modestly, prudently and gently, but do carry out the blessed words of my text: "Be not afraid, but speak, and hold not thy peace." Be this to each one his word of good cheer: "For I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city."

God bless you, for Christ's sake. Amen and amen.

By a London Clergyman.

THE TWO FRIENDS.

CHAPTER I.

JOHN STEWART was about to start in life, and had just come to say good-by to his old friend and crony, David Somerton. He was feeling immensely important, was John. He had long been ambitious of moving to some larger sphere than little cramped-up Cratton. And now that his way was at last clear he was not slow to take advantage of it. He was full of big plans and projects, and had no doubts whatever of his performing them. And, to tell the truth, John Stewart was a young fellow who ought to get on well. With a fair exterior, a good healthy brain, and unmistakable self-possession, he clearly had as fair a chance as any one. Perhaps he was a little too self-confident and sure; but, as many would say, that was to err on the right side, I will not dwell on it.

"And so you are going to leave us, are you, John?" said his friend. "Well, you have my prayers and my heartiest good wishes."

"Thanks, old fellow; I'm quite sure of that. But I do pity you remaning cooped up in this miserable little hole. I wish you would come with me." David Somerton wished he could for more reasons than one. He had great influence over his friend, and felt somewhat doubtful of his ability to go on straight wthout a friendly hand to lead him. And, over and above this, it was his great desire, too, to launch out into the world. He felt some envious twinges at first when he heard of John's good fortune. But quickly and resolutely stifling these, he turned his thoughts to his friend's needs.

"John, my boy," he said, laying his two hands on his friend's shoulders and looking him straight in the face, "You're going where they say it's hard to do right and keep straight—where young men especially have either to fight hard or give in. Keep a good lookout, old fellow and don't be caught napping."

"That's all right," rejoined John; "I'm not afraid. I always sleep with one eye open. Nobody will get the better of John Stewart in a hurry."

"You won't be vexed," David Somerton went on to say, "if I tell you of something that's pressing heavily upon my mind. But I wish you'd keep on turning your back on the drink, and remain a teetotaler. They say that strong drink is a terrible snare to young men in London."

"Now David," responded his friend, somewhat irritated, "I never knew such a fellow as you are. Anybody would think I was a little boy, to hear you talk. The fact is," he continued loftily, "teetotalism is all very well for this place, but in London it will never do. Don't you trouble. I can take care of myself as well as anybody. And as for strong drink gaining the mastery over me, why, it's perfect nonsense. I'm not going to promise anything. If I think it right, and the proper thing to do, depend upon it I shall do it."

David Somerton's face grew very sad at this speech. He simply said, "Well, John, you're your own master, to be sure; but remember, I've warned you." Then taking his friend's hand, he drew him with himself to his knees, and, in a few short, broken petitions, prayed for him that he might be kept steady and strong, and learn to trust wholly to the strong arm of his Lord and Master. There were tears in both the young men's eyes when they rose from their knees, and when they said the last good-by, and clasped hands, said John Stewart: "Thank you, my kind old friend. I won't forget what you have said. And when we meet again you'll find me all right. So don't fear."

They parted. John Stewart to enter a London bank, and David Somerton to stay behind, waiting the time when, perhaps, he too might launch out into life. His thoughts were often hovering about his friend, and his prayers continually ascending to God on his behalf. He had less faith in John's stability than John himself. And knowing him to be a genial, social fellow, who hated, above all things, to be alone, he feared lest he might have chosen the gay and the fast for his friends.

John's letters threw little light upon the subject. All he ever said was that he was very fortunate in having picked up with some jolly young fellows, who had no nonsense about them, and were the best of company, and that they had taught him a good many wrinkles which he would never have learned in slow suffocating old Cratton. The light gay tone of his letters was a feature David did not at all like. And when, one day, there came a letter with part of a circle upon it, as though a wet wine-glass had been resting there, he began to be very suspicious and doubtful.

He was always careful in his letters to press home the evils of drink, and the benefits he himself had received from abstaining. "Oh, John," he would plead, "for God's sake, keep away from the drink! Bad company and the drink ever go together."

At last John Stewart's letters ceased altogether. They had been coming more and more slowly lately. And as his family had left Cratton some six months before, David had no means of ascertaining how his friend was getting on, and had to content himself with hoping for the best. Just after the parting already described David Somerton's uncle came home from China, after having made a large fortune there, and being of a liberal nature, he had offered to give his nephew a choice of whatever profession he would best like. Now it so happened that David was longing, above all things, to be a barrister; and eagerly accepting his uncle's generous offer, at once began his preparations for his chosen profession.

Some years passed away before David was called to the bar. And well qualified was he for his duties. With a solid mind, a generous heart, a neat pat way of putting things, and, over and above all this, a good lawyer friend, able and willing to put him in the way of cases, he was not likely to lag behind in the race to fortune. And so when, some years after his parting with John Stewart, he found himself fairly started in life, with a good bright prospect before him, he knelt down and commended his whole future to the care of Him whom He trusted as His Saviour and Friend.

What David warned John Stewart against he now found by experience to be quite true. It was not easy to keep straight and to hold his own. Temptations to go wrong were continually presenting themselves to him. And the more he struggled and resisted and fought, the more he was beset. There were young men about him with fascinating ways, and fine appearance, who laid themselves out to draw him into their set.

They flattered him—they pleaded with him—they laughed at him—and adopted every possible expedient to upset what they called his "miserable morality." And when we consider that David Somerton lived alone, and possessed instincts as social as any one, and that his resistance to his tempters shut him off from nearly all companionship, we need not wonder that he found his part a very difficult one to play. But he kept on, and bore their laughter and ridicule bravely and well, and would not permit the least suspicion of evil to stain his life.

Altogether David Somerton was a puzzle to the men who were about him. They knew that they could never have stood so much persecution and bantering—that they would have given in long before. And how he could bear up, and keep on, and never flinch, was one of the greatest mysteries they had ever considered. It was perfectly wonderful; and they could not help respecting the young fellow, and thinking well of him.

Later on, when some of them came to him and candidly confessed themselves beaten, and asked if they might accompany him in the path he had chosen, he told them all,

"It's very simple; the reason of my steadfa ness is that I was fastened and fixed to t Strong One. I never trusted myself. I w ever lifting up my poor weak heart to my Lo in prayer."

IT may be well to begin my remarks by c fessing, before our Lord and this large and c tivated congregation of Christians, my o shortcomings of interest and labor in behalf sailors. In common, it is feared, with many my brethren in all branches of the Church have allowed the multitudes of men who down to the sea in ships to sail away, so far I have been concerned, from all notice, all sy pathy, all prayer, all effort for their salvati Lately my mind and heart have been stron drawn toward seamen, and I was glad whe was to make a brief appeal in their behalf night.

I. In the first place, the

is so large as to demand attention. It is es mated that there are half a million of Americ sailors, twice as many British, and of all tions fully three millions of men, whose busin is in ships and with the sea, actually engaged the navies and the commercial transports of world. Three millions of human beings! th millions of immortal souls! In the compu tion of the Divine Teacher, the loss of one these souls would not be compensated by gain of a whole world, and the loss of th millions could not be made good by the gain all the solar system, with all its worlds a forces and resources.

A loathsome contagious disease mi invade them. It could spread only to the li of that population, and its ravages would cease for want of material. They might all die. There the destruction would stop. But fancy every one of those three millions to be infected of the small-pox, and from that island to be ransported to every known port of the world and turned loose among the inhabitants.

What consternation, what horrors, what destruction would they not propagate among all peoples? The same holds good of their power and opportunities to propagate the virus of vice. Better have any other three millions of men upon earth weak, ignorant, and wicked, than our three millions of itinerant, restless, irre-ressible sailors!

III. Regard the

ne world owes its sailors. But for them, to y nothing of peopling our continents and lands, how slow would be the progress of civ-ization! Each nation would have to struggle n as best it could, gathering from its own soil hat wealth it could, and shaping it as well as racticable, without the benefit of the example, e aid, and the stimulus of other nations, and thout the products of other lands and without e fabrics produced by other populations.

To bring this home to ourselves, let us fancy at before to-morrow morning there should be ddenly taken out of this great city every book, cture, statue, engine, implement, wrought ork of any kind, fine and coarse goods, and ery idea and every man that have been brought us from every part of the world during the t quarter of a century! No! We are not ual to t[illegible]t fancy. We are not sufficiently nscious of our indebtedness to other lands to int to ourselves the picture of the emptiness, disruption, the desolation there would be.

The goods would leave a thousand stores and rehouses bare; splendid mansions would be mantled; manufactories would be silent, cause the machinery had departed; "the stone uld cry out of the wall," Farewell! "and the m out of the timber would answer it;" the lls of art galleries and the alcoves of libraries uld be stripped of their most precious treas-es, and the opera houses would be hushed, for singing men and singing women would have vn, and there would be no display of belles l beaux on Broadway and the Avenue.

For she that should put off her silks and laces l fine linens and jewellery after to-night's en-tainment would awake in the morning poor lora McFlimsey of Madison Square," and ab-utely and literally with "nothing to wear," l her "nice" young friend, Frederick Au-tus Shoddy, whose father grew so rich in the by cheating the soldiers and swindling the vernment, that Frederick Augustus has noth- about him that is not foreign, would awake find his wardrobe suddenly reduced to the mer costume of a Fiji Islander; and the r drayman's occupation would be gone, and s would fall, and the Atlantic cable be drown- and business stagnate, and amid all this new huge distress all the great and beautiful con-ts, ideas, fancies, and thoughts which the sts of foreign lands have sent us would be nt.

h! I cannot go on. I do not know what it is sailors have not brought us. But in so h as we should be impoverished if we should all that hath come to us from afar in ships he last quarter of a century, in so much are the debtors of the sailors of that period. l in the extremest mountain cove of our land ould probably be impossible to find a man who ot debtor to the uncared-for sailor.

V. The sailor is

t you may feel how true that is, say that this hour there shall be no more sailors. band the whole marine force of the world. s would rot in the docks, the products of earth would rot on distant plantations, sea-s would be emptied, for men would fly for , all city property would become worthless, ity heat and intensity which stimulate the mental activity of the world would be gone. Paris must be as far from us, for all uses, as any city that may exist in the planet Uranus.

You should have no more foreign books, pictures, statues, preachers, lecturers, singers, machinery, materials, and ideas. You could send nothing abroad, not even your invalid daughter for her health and your gifted artist boy for his culture. Your coasting would all be done away, and even your home products would become more difficult of transportation. Science would have a vast domain of observation cut away. Your planet would be reduced to the continent you inhabit. The shrinkage would be sudden and prodigious.

You can do well enough without your soldier, the epauletted and strutting "fuss and feathers," the costliest piece of worthlessness modern civilization insanely maintains and idolizes. But you cannot do without your sailor. If there had been no cannon or sword, no general or private, no army or armor in any part of the globe during the past century, who does not believe that the world would have been happier? But would it have been happier if there had been no ship, no sailor, no white sails on the seas, and no smoke-track across the ocean? And yet you parade your soldiers, and remember them and pay them well, and give them honors, and erect monuments to them when they are dead.

Did they ever dare more than the sailor? Is the picket outpost more dangerous than the yard-arm in a heavy sea? Did you feel the force of the stanza which you sung a few moments ago?

> "How little know ye, who are peacefully sleeping
> On beds of repose, unawakened and warm,
> The woes of the sailor, his dreary watch keeping,
> Amid all the horrors of midnight and storm!"

Think of his strange and lonely and unappreciated life! Think of the Arctic colds that benumb him and the tropic suns that scorch him! Think of his battle with the fierce storms, when seas come down upon his ship with the impetuosity of a cavalry charge and a thunder like the crash of artillery! And his battles are fought without the stimulus of drum and trumpet and wheeling squadrons, and the loud shout of men and the prancing of the snorting war-steeds, and all the kindling electricity of a thousand eyes that flash the same fire as his and witness his deeds of daring. They are performed in the solitude of mid-ocean; they are achieved unapplauded in the heart of unsympathetic darkness. Through all the night he is straining every faculty and power that is in him to bring your child and my wife and thousands of treasure safe to port; and in the night he may be swept from the deck, or fall from the yard-arm amid the howl of a tempest that drowns his death-scream, and it was only a sailor lost!

No chronicles, no poets for him, no orators, no monument! Why, there is probably not a month in which six hundred sailors do not dare all that the British Light Brigade did at Balaklava. Of sailors as of soldiers it is true:

> "Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs not to make reply,
> Theirs but to do and die."

And when, in the awful emergencies of ocean life which have overtaken them among icebergs or the cyclones,

> Billow "to right of them,"
> Billow "to left of them," > Billow "in front of them
> "Volleyed and thundered," > Midst storm "like shot and shell
> Boldly they" sailed "and well,
> Into the jaws of death,
> Into the mouth of hell,"
> Many a "Six hundred."

If they had been soldiers a laureate would have sung their praises; but being only sailors, no one sings,

> "Honor the brave and bold;
> Long shall the tale be told—
> Yes, when our babes are old—
> How they sailed onward."

A GREAT MISSIONARY FORCE

V. When the gentleman, whom we shall probably agree to pronounce the chief of the men of science America has produced, projected "the wind and current charts," they were placed in the hands of every navigator who would take them, so that the observations of as many persons as possible, at as many times as possible, and in as many places as possible, might be discussed, so that the results might be presented in charts "for the improvement of commerce and navigation." The value of this plan attracted more and more attention, until in a few years the United States, Great Britain, France, Russia, Sweden, Norway, Holland, Denmark, Belgium, Portugal, Spain, Prussia, Sardinia, the Pontifical States, the free City of Hamburg, the Republics of Bremen and Chili, and the Empires of Austria and Brazil were all co-operating on the same plan of observation. Lieutenant Maury well says:

"Rarely before has there been such a sublime spectacle presented to the scientific world; all nations agreeing to unite and co-operate in carrying out one system of philosophical research with regard to the sea. Though they may be enemies in all else, here they are to be friends. Every ship that navigates the high seas with these charts and blank abstract logs on board may henceforth be regarded as a floating observatory, a temple of science."

Dear Christian brethren, is not this a profound and sublime lesson for us? Suppose we could make all the sailors of Christendom real workers for Christ, how soon the world would be regenerated! Will the world ever be Christianized while our sailors are so neglected? We can never forget the exciting words of the prophet Isaiah (60:5), in which he addresses the Church: "Then shalt thou see and brighten up, and thy heart shall throb and swell, because the abundance (or, multitude) of the sea shall be converted unto thee, and the forces of the Gentiles (or, the nations) shall come unto thee."

Look at the comparatively feeble results of modern missionary effort. Why is it? Why, brethren, so long as we attempt to Christianize a foreign continent or island of the sea by sending over a ship containing two missionaries, twenty hogsheads of New England rum, and a crew of profane, drunken, licentious sailors, we never shall Christianize those people. While the two missionaries are learning the rudiments of the language the sailors will have made such an impression of Christianity upon the natives as a generation of preachers cannot erase. No, my brethren, we cannot have the world won to Jesus while our sailors belong to the service of Satan.

To the end that they be enlisted for Christ, the energies of Christendom must be turned to the conversion of its sailors. Do you not believe that if every man that left every port were truly, simply, earnestly, a real servant of Jesus, a witness for Christ, an example of the power of Christian principles upon human character, you would have little need of missionary societies?

I do believe that the words of Isaiah were spoken in logical order as well as in poetic splendor. I do believe that the forces of the Gentiles shall not come to our Zion until first the abudance of the sea be converted to her. Let us turn our powers, our energies, our will, our faith, our love, our prayers, toward these too long neglected men; let us enlist them for truth and the Lord's Church, and then, instead of the stillness which is upon the nations and the feeble echoes which come to us from abroad, we shall be able to shout what it were false to sing to-night:

> "Hark! the songs of jubilee
> Loud as mighty thunders roar,
> Or the fullness of the sea
> When it breaks upon the shore;
> Hallelujah! for the Lord
> God Omnipotent doth reign;
> Hallelujah! let the word
> Echo round the earth and main."

A CHOICE VINDICATED.

"An Unpleasant Business."

Sir William had never before given a hint that he was pleased with anything I did. He was a very silent man, and seldom expressed his feelings, and, therefore, a few words of praise from him were worth double what they would have been had they come from any one else, and I felt very thankful that God had enabled me to please him in this matter.

"Evelyn is coming upstairs now, Miss Lindsay," said Sir William, as he left the room; "will you be so kind as to see that she goes to bed at once?"

I promised to do so, and presently he brought her up-stairs. She looked very tired and troubled, and her eyes were swollen with crying, but she put her arms round my neck and kissed me, and was very loving and affectionate to me. When her father had gone down-stairs she said,

"Oh, May! I am so glad I told papa—so very glad; I am so much happier now."

"I was sure you would be, Evelyn dear," I said; it is terrible to have a secret like that weighing on the mind."

"Yes," she said, "I am very glad I told him; but oh, May, he was so angry—not with me, not half enough with me; he would not see that it was my fault, but he was terribly angry with Donald."

"I do not think you can be surprised at that, Evelyn dear," I said; "I do not think Mr. Trafford behaved honorably, and Sir William is such an honorable man himself that he felt it very keenly."

"Yes, perhaps so," she said; "but I don't think Donald meant any harm. Poor Donald does not think before he does things; he—"

But I would not let Evelyn talk any more about it that night, but rang the bell for Clemence, and went with her to her bedroom. She kissed me at the door, and as she said "Good-night" she whispered,

"Papa has taken that ring, May; he says it must have cost at least £50, and he is sure Donald has no money to pay for it."

The next morning no one alluded to what had happened the night before; even when we were alone Evelyn did not seem inclined to speak of it, and I made every effort that I could to turn her thoughts into another channel.

Sir William spent most of that day in his private room writing letters, and we seldom saw him, but he was very tender and loving to Evelyn whenever he came into the room, and seemed anxious to make her feel how entirely he had forgiven her.

Evelyn and I were sitting together at the window with our work, when the man started for the village with the post-bag. Evelyn watched it out of sight, and then turned to me with a sorrowful face.

"Poor Donald!" she said; "what will he say when he gets it?"

It was the first time that she had mentioned her cousin that day. I begged her to try not to think of what he would say, but to feel very thankful that she had done what was right, and could now look her father in the face with a happy heart.

It must have been, I think, two days after this that, as Evelyn was lying on the sofa reading, and I was sitting beside her writing a letter, we heard a carriage coming quickly up the avenue.

"A carriage!" said Evelyn; "I wonder who is coming! Just look out, May."

I went to the window, but I did not know the carriage at all, and as it came nearer I saw that it was a hired one, and that there was one gentleman inside.

"Can you see who it is?" Evelyn asked.

"I can see him, Evelyn," I said, "but I do not know who it is; it is no one that I have ever seen before. I think he wants Sir William; he and Ambrose have come out upon the drive together, and Ambrose is pointing in various directions. There! he has sent the carriage away; he is evidently going to stay!"

"This is quite exciting!" said Evelyn, laughing; "I must come and look."

She put down her book, got up from the sofa, and came to the window. Ambrose was still talking to the strange gentleman in the middle of the drive, and pointing to various parts of the park, as if he were trying to tell him where Sir William had gone.

"Oh, May," she said, "it is Uncle Edward; what can he want?"

"Uncle Edward?" I repeated.

"Yes," she said, "Donald's father. Oh, I wonder why he has come! I am sure it is about Donald. What can be the matter?"

She sat down, looking quite faint and ill.

"Don't be troubled about it, Evelyn dear," I said; "very likely your uncle has only come in answer to Sir William's letter. Sir William would be sure to write to him about what you told him the other night; would he not? And most probably your uncle wants to talk it over with him."

"Oh yes," she said, "that must be it; do you think I should go down and speak to Uncle Edward?"

"No," I said; "you must lie down directly; you do not look at all fit to go down-stairs, and I will tell Ambrose to ask your uncle to come up here."

But before I had time to carry out my intention the door opened, and Mr. Edward Trafford came in.

"How do you do, Evelyn, my dear?" he said, in an agitated voice; "Can you tell me in which diretion your father has gone? Ambrose has been trying to explain to me, but I could not quite make out what he meant, these different turnings in the park are so bewildering."

"Had not you better wait, uncle, till papa comes back?" said Evelyn; "I do not think he can be long now, and you might miss him if you went to meet him."

"Yes," he said, "so I might; I think I will wait."

"You will have luncheon, uncle?" said Evelyn.

"No, no! indeed, my dear," said her uncle; "no, I had something as I came along—no, I could not touch anything now. I will go down-stairs and look if I can see your father coming."

"Is anything the matter, uncle?" asked Evelyn anxiously; "are any of them ill at home?"

"Oh no," he said hurriedly; "no dear, no one is ill. I just want to see your father on business."

He was very pale and agitated, and looked, Evelyn said, years older than when she had seen him last.

We watched him go out upon the drive again, and look first in one direction and then another. Then he passed up and down in front of the house for more than half an hour, looking troubled and distressed, and with his eyes fixed on the ground, but glancing up hastily every few minutes to see if his brother was in sight.

At last Sir William appeared, and we saw the brothers meet. They did not come into the house, but they turned into one of the private walks in the park and paced up and down, backward and forward, for more than an hour. Each time that they turned round they came for some little distance within sight of the house, and then they were hidden from our view by the trees, and we could not see them again till they came back to the same place. They seemed to be talking very earnestly, and now and again they stood still and spoke to each other face to face, as though they were arguing some important point, on which they could not agree, or at least could not come to any satisfactory conclusion.

Evelyn was very restless the whole time. She began to follow the example of her father and uncle, and to pace up and down the room; but I insisted on her putting her feet up on the sofa and remaining quiet.

At length the two gentlemen brought their walk and their talk to a conclusion and came toward the house. Sir William ran up-stairs as soon as he came in.

"How are you, my dear child?" he said to Evelyn, even more tenderly than usual; "you look so pale. Please take care of her, Miss Lindsay, and make her lie down."

"What is the matter, papa?" whispered Evelyn, while I prepared to leave the room, thinking Sir William might wish to speak to her alone.

"Oh! I will tell you about it afterward, dear," said her father; "it is some rather unpleasant business about which your uncle wanted to see me. Don't go away, please, Miss Lindsay; we have letters to write at once, I must not stay now."

In spite of Evelyn's pleading glances, Sir William went down-stairs, and he and his brother, after hastily partaking of dinner, spent the rest of the evening together in Sir William's private room.

"What can it be?" Evelyn kept saying. "What can papa mean by unpleasant business? It can't be about what I told him the other night, or he would have said so. What can be the matter?"

Of course I could not help her to find out; we could only wonder and wait.

Mr. Edward Trafford left the next morning at a very early hour, that he might catch the first train for London. Sir William and I were alone at breakfast, for Evelyn was not well enough to rise.

"How is Evelyn this morning?" said Sir William, anxiously, as I entered the room.

I told him that she had had a bad night, and was still in bed.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear!" he said; "I will not tell her to-day; I think it might upset her still more; I will wait till she is somewhat better."

"Don't you think, Sir William," I ventured to say, "that the suspense of not knowing what is the matter is worse for Evelyn than knowing the truth?"

"Well, perhaps you are right, Miss Lindsay," he said; "I will tell her after breakfast."

"I hope it is no great trouble, Sir William."

"Well, it is a most unpleasant business," he said; "the fact is, that nephew of mine is a downright rascal. What poor Evelyn ever saw to admire in him I never could tell. I always knew he was good for nothing but mischief, and he has proved I was right. I will tell you about it, Miss Lindsay, and then you can advise me as to the best way of telling Evelyn.

"You know my brother was here yesterday—poor fellow, he is dreadfully crushed by it! I am very sorry for him, although, as I could not help telling him, he was himself to blame for it. He was so weak with that boy; he gave him everything he wanted as a child, and spoiled him, and pampered him, and petted him, and let him order every one in the house about, and then was foolish enough to expect him after this to turn out well and to earn his own living.

"But to make a long story short, my brother received a telegram the night before last telling him that his son had run off from the bank, taking more than £500 with him. No one knows where he is gone, and, of course, detectives have been sent off in all directions to catch him, and his poor father is quite weighed down with shame and sorrow. If he is found, of course he will get a long term of imprisonment; and if he escapes it is not likely that his friends will ever hear of him again, for he will never dare to come to England."

"Where do they think he has gone?" I asked.

"Probably to Spain," Sir William said, "but we cannot tell. And now, what do you think about my telling Evelyn? I am afraid it will upset her very much!"

"Yes," I said, "I am afraid it will; she will feel it dreadfully, but still I almost think it would be better to tell her, for she must know some time, and she will be less able to bear it if she is kept longer in suspense."

"Well," said Sir William, "I believe you are right, Miss Lindsay ; I will go up-stairs now ; it will be better to get it over."

DEATH AND BURIAL OF JACOB.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 12th, Gen. 49 and 50, 1-13. Golden Text, Job 5 : 26. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IT must be always a solemn moment when a ather speaks his last words to his children. After aving blessed Ephraim and Manasseh, Jacob alled unto his sons and said, " Gather yourselves ogether, that I may tell you that which shall efall you in the last days. Gather yourselves ogether, and hear, ye sons of Jacob ; and hearkn unto Israel your father." The time was ome when all things appeared to the dying man n their true light. He was too near eternity to be azzled by the shine, or blinded by the dust of arth ; the rest of God had settled down upon is own spirit, and he was free from all personal reoccupation, so that he could make known to is family, being as the mouthpiece of God to hem, what were the dangerous tendencies in ach of their characters, and what was the conseuence of their sins.

Reuben was his firstborn, his might, but he ad sinned fearfully ; and therefore although he as " the excellency of dignity, and the excelncy of power," yet the judgment was proounced upon him, " Unstable as water, do not ou excel " (see margin). Reuben's position as e eldest son of Jacob made his sin so unspeakly heinous ; as the son of Jacob, and the deendant of Abraham and Isaac, of whom God id, " I am the God of Abraham and the God Isaac," it was not his own name only which euben disgraced, but that of God and those of s fathers. The relation in which a Christian ands to the Lord makes his every sin to be a flection upon the name of Christ ; " I wrought r My name's sake that it should not be pollut before the brethren" (Ezek. 20 : 9, 14, 22). meon and Levi had also grievously sinned in e slaughter of the people of Shechem (chap.). Their dying father said of them, " O my ul, come not thou into their secret ; unto their sembly, mine honor, be not thou united . . . . rsed be their anger, for it was fierce ; and eir wrath, for it was cruel : I will divide them in cob, and scatter them in Israel." Could it be t Levi humbled himself before God because his father's dying words, and that his curse s turned into a blessing? Although truly ided in Jacob, and scattered in Israel, he had best portion of all, for the Lord was his part his inheritance (Num. 18 : 20; Deut. : 9).

ooking upon Judah, the old man saw through turies until his should be the ruling tribe, udah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall ise ; thy hand shall be in the neck of thine mies ; thy father's children shall bow down ore thee. Judah is a lion's whelp ; from the y, my son, thou art gone up ; he stooped n, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion ; shall rouse him up? The sceptre shall not art from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between feet, until Shiloh come ; and unto Him shall gathering of the people be." The Lord as said to the Pharisees, " Your father Abra- rejoiced to see My day, and he saw it and glad" (John 8 : 56). Jacob also saw the day Christ ; he saw that Shiloh, the Messiah who to come out of Judah, " should gather toher in one the children of God that were scatd abroad" (John 11 : 52).

f Zebulun Jacob said little else than that portion should be at the sea-coast ; of Issa- , " He saw that rest was good, and the land it was pleasant ; and bowed his shoulder to , and became a servant unto tribute." That may know true rest we must learn obedi . " He that is entered into rest, he also hath ed from his own works, as God did from ' (Heb. 4 : 10). Of Dan he said, " Dan (i.e., ment) shall judge his people," but he likened to " a serpent by the way," and " an adder e path, that biteth the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward," referring, perhaps, to the position of Dan in the camp as bringing up the rear.

It is just here, after his words about Dan, that the patriarch breaks out into the exclamation, " I have waited for Thy salvation, O Lord." While occupied with his sons his soul must look up to God as though he needed the might of His hand to hold him in these last hours. He said little about Gad, Asher, and Naphtali. Gad should be overcome but should finally conquer, Asher should yield royal dainties, Naphtali was " a hind let loose ; he giveth goodly words." But words alone are like a hind let loose ; who can bring them back again? How truly James says of the tongue, " Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth" (James 3 : 5).

We have alluded to the blessing of Joseph in our papers on his history, and have seen how, even in his lifetime, the words of Jacob concerning him were fulfilled. He concluded by saying, " By the God of thy father, who shall help thee ; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts, and of the womb. The blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills ; they shall be on the head of Joseph, and on the crown of the head of him that was separate from his brethren." The love of Jacob for his son Joseph had passed through death. The self-seeking which was mingled with it was now gone ; if he honored Joseph above his brethren it was because God had honored him. The coat of many colors had been a small honor in comparison with the rule-ship of Egypt. It was God who had made him great because he was " separate from his brethren." Joseph had stood by God in his own family, and God had stood by him in Egypt ; now Jacob's love could be a holy love, and it became the channel of the mind of God.

Had Joseph remained in his father's house and experienced none of the trials through which God had led him, he might have become uplifted, and utterly unfit for the position he afterward occupied in Egypt. God took him in a marvellous manner away from the evil influences of a father's partiality, that he might fit him for his place of usefulness and honor. Real love to our children is pure from all self-seeking ; when we indulge them we gratify our fleshly wills ; it is knowing them " after the flesh" (2 Cor. 5 : 16). If we take counsel with God about them, He may lead them, perhaps, through suffering and humiliation, but only to educate and fit them for future glory. Oh, for wisdom every moment for this solemn, precious charge!

There was yet one son, Benjamin, of whom Jacob said, " Benjamin shall raven as a wolf : in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil." Thus we see that Judah and Joseph were the two sons who peculiarly came into the blessing of their father, and in the pre-eminence of the tribes of Judah and Ephraim as the heads of the divided people of Israel after the death of Solomon (see Ezek. 37 : 16) ; we see the commencement of the fulfilment of this prophecy, which, however, can only be fully realized when the children of Israel are brought back into their land and own their Messiah.

" All these are the twelve tribes of Israel : and this is it that their father spake unto them, and blessed them ; every one according to his blessing he blessed them. And he charged them, and said unto them, I am to be gathered unto my people ; bury me with my fathers in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite. . . . There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife ; there they buried Isaac and Rebekah his wife, and there I buried Leah." Jacob was present in all probability at the burial of both Abraham and Isaac, for he must have been about twelve or thirteen years old when Abraham died, and we are told that Esau and Jacob buried Isaac (Gen. 35 : 29). " And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people." The old man's work was done, and our golden text was fulfilled, " Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in his season."

There was no fear about this deathbed of Jacob, no uncertainty as to whether he should live or die. We cannot be sure whether it was usually the case that God showed the patriarchs when they were about to die. Isaac, when he became blind, many years before he died, said, " Behold now, I am old, I know not the day of my death" (Gen. 27 : 2) ; but the circumstances of his death and that of Abraham's are not related ; but to Joseph and to both Moses and Aaron God showed beforehand that they were about to die. After the agitated life of Jacob, this calm, prepared end is doubly precious. " Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth : Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors ; and their works do follow them" (Rev. 14 : 13).

" And Joseph fell upon his father's face, and wept upon him, and kissed him. And Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father : and the physicians embalmed Israel." Had it been otherwise, Jacob's last wish, viz., to be buried in the land of Canaan, could not have been carried out. The process of embalming took forty days to complete, " and the Egyptians mourned for him threescore and ten days." Such a tribute to his memory shows how deep was the gratitude felt to Joseph.

" And when the days of his mourning were past, Joseph spake unto the house of Pharaoh, saying, If now I have found grace in your eyes, speak, I pray you, in the ears of Pharaoh, saying, My father made me swear, saying, Lo, I die ; in my grave which I have digged for me in the land of Canaan, there shalt thou bury me. Now therefore let me go up, I pray thee, and bury my father, and I will come again." It is not easy to understand why Joseph did not himself make this request to Pharaoh. One cannot well conceive that any one else had more influence with the king than he had. Did he fear that Pharaoh would not let him go, because he could so ill be spared? But then Joseph knew how to take such a difficulty to God, and it would appear like a want of faith to make the house of Pharaoh intercessors with the king, when he knew the power of God, in whose hand are the hearts of all men.

" And Pharaoh said, Go up, and bury thy father, according as he hath made thee swear. And Joseph went up to bury his father ; and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt, and all the house of Joseph, and his brethren, and his father's house : only their little ones, and their flocks, and their herds, they left in the land of Goshen. And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen ; and it was a very great company." What a contrast to the time of his compulsory entrance into the land of Egypt, as a lad of seventeen sold as a slave by the unjust tyranny of his brothers! Who could have foreseen his coming back in such state, the one had in honor among all the Egyptians, the greatest among his brethren!

When this large company came to the threshing floor of Atad, which is beyond Jordan, " they mourned with a great and very sore lamentation." They were touching the soil which had been promised by God to Abraham's posterity, and they mourned for him who was an inheritor of the land. The inhabitants of the land were so struck by the sight that they named the spot " Abel-mizraim"—i.e., the mourning of the Egyptians. " And his sons did unto him according as he commanded them : for his sons carried him into the land of Canaan, and buried him in the cave of the field of Machpelah, which Abraham bought with the field for a possession of a burying-place of Ephron the Hittite, before Mamre." So ended the life of one who represents a large number of believers ; faulty, weak in faith, but one in whom the grace of God was wonderfully manifested in spite of his unfaithfulness.

To Our Readers.

IT is again our privilege to acknowledge the favor of God in the success which has attended the publication of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Neither expense nor exertion has been spared to increase the circulation of the journal; but the blessing of the Most High, by whom all circumstances are controlled, has been entreated on every effort, and our duty now is humbly and distinctly to ascribe the result to Him.

THE CIRCULATION

has a little more than doubled in the past twelve months. It now equals or surpasses that of two thirds of the leading religious weeklies of New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago. The paper has not stood still for a day. There has not been a day, not even during the dullest period of the summer, when we have not received five or more subscribers, and we have on several days, before the great rush of the present month, received more than FIFTY. The sales by the NEWS COMPANIES have kept rapid pace with the subscription list, and are, we believe, without parallel among religious papers in this country.

During the year, the publisher has personally travelled in the following States, in each of which agents are now actively at work in the interest of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Alabama,
Arkansas,
Florida,
Georgia,
Kentucky,
Louisiana,
Massachusetts,
New Hampshire,
New Jersey,
New York,
North Carolina,
Ohio,
Pennsylvania,
Rhode Island,
South Carolina,
Tennessee,
Texas,
Vermont,
Virginia.

The circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has extended beyond seas in a manner that surpasses all our anticipations of last year. Without counting one free copy, the paper goes by subscription to the following countries, provinces, and dependencies, outside of the United States:

Bahamas,
British Columbia,
Burmah,
Cape Colony,
England,
India,
Ireland,
Japan,
Manitoba (Canada),
Mexico,
New Brunswick,
North-West Territories (Canada),
Nova Scotia,
Ontario (Canada),
Prince Edward Island,
Quebec (Canada),
Sandwich Islands,
Scotland,
Switzerland,
Turkey,
U. S. of Colombia (South America),
West Coast of Africa.

The subscription list in the United States embraces every one of the thirty-nine States, and ten Territories.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD commends itself to the following classes:

THE PEOPLE

take it because it is strictly undenominational.

MINISTERS

take it because it does not interfere with any other religious paper.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS

take it because between the sermons of Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage they get the purest and most instructive reading of modern literature. The Sunday-School Lessons in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are written by Mrs. M. Baxter.

SUBSCRIBERS

renew for it because it is never forced upon them after their subscriptions expire, unless they order it to be continued.

FAMILIES

like it because it gives a clear Gospel note on every page, and because it never trifles with sacred subjects.

LADIES

like it intuitively, and it is the most welcome New Year's Gift that can be presented to them.

CHILDREN

like it because they can understand it.

CHRISTIANS

take it because it is the outspoken foe of Rationalism, Romanism, Ritualism, Unitarianism, Universalism, and Moderate Drinking.

TRACT DISTRIBUTERS

take it because it is one of the best tracts they can give away.

AGENTS

canvass for it because they cannot make the same commission as easily on any other publication.

NEWSDEALERS

take it because the low price brings many customers.

Subscription Price, ... $1 50.

The Late Rev. ROLLIN H. NEALE, D.D., Forty Years Pastor of the First Baptist Church, Boston.

THE REV. ROLLIN NEALE, D.D.

An Ancient Church—Persecutions—An Old Writ—Dr. Stillman's Successful Ministry—Neale's Birth at Southington, Conn.—His Early Conversion—Desire for Education—An Elder Brother's Gift—Fruits of his Early Labor—A Great Awakening—A Visits to Denmark—In Charge of the Police—Lectures at Harvard—Last Sermon—The Apostle of Charity—Two Pockets—The Place to tell Troubles.

REV. DR. NEALE was pastor for forty years of the First Baptist Church of Boston. The church itself has had a remarkable history. It was constituted in 1665. Some of its articles agreed upon then, and still retained, bring back the echoes of a struggle long passed away. For instance: "We acknowledge Magistracy to be an ordinance of God, and to submit ourselves to them in the Lord, not because of wrath only, but also for conscience sake." They were regarded as disturbers of the peace, and a warrant was issued requiring the constable "to labor to discover where these people were assembled, and to require them to attend the established worship." They were brought before the court, disfranchised, fined, imprisoned, some of them remaining in Boston jail a year, and then threatened with banishment from the colony.

In 1679 they had succeeded in building a meeting-house, but they had assembled only three or four times when they found the doors nailed up, and the following notice posted: "All persons are to take notice that by order of the court, the doors of this house are shut, and that they are inhibited to hold any meetings therein, or to open the doors thereof, without license from the authorities till the court take further order, as they will answer the contrary at their peril.

"Signed, Edward Rawson, Sec."

These original writs, yellow with age, still hang in the vestry of the church. Their pastor, who had been by trade a shoemaker, wrote a history of the sufferings of his flock, to which one of the Boston ministers replied in a pamphlet entitled, "Cobbler, stick to your Last."

A great change in public sentiment, however, was soon effected, so that when the church called another pastor, some of the men who had been most bitter against them, notably Dr. Increase Mather and Cotton Mather, not only agreed to the settlement, but performed the principal services on the occasion, and in the very house which had once been nailed up by the authority of the court. This pastor, Mr. Callender, had been educated at Harvard College, and was the first Baptist minister in that section of the country who had received a collegiate education.

One of the most distinguished of Dr. Neale's predecessors was Dr. Stillman, who became pastor in 1765—a hundred years after the formation of the church—and continued in the office forty-two years. He was a man of great eloquence, courtly in his manners, an ardent patriot, and altogether one of the most distinguished clergymen. His church was crowded; strangers, after seeing "the sights," would not leave the city until they had heard him. His was one of the few meeting-houses kept open during the Revolutionary War.

Dr. Francis Wayland, afterward President of Brown University, and Dr. William Hague were in this succession. Dr. Neale loved to allude to these noble men who had preceded him.

Rollin Heber Neale was born at Southington, Conn., September 15th, 1808. He would say, "I was born in Connecticut, and I am not ashamed of it. To my eye there are no sunnier scenes on earth than those to be found at Southington." He was the youngest of ten children.

A GODLY FATHER AND MOTHER

made their influence felt, not only in the home but far beyond it. The church of the place was very feeble, and its interests were often discussed by the fireside. Indeed, that home seemed to be a rallying point for what strength remained. The father despondingly remarked to a visiting pastor one day, "I don't see what is to become of the church after we are gone." "God will take care of that," said his guest. "Who knows but God will raise up that boy" (pointing to Rollin) "to become a preacher."

Rollin was converted very early. He was a leader among his companions in all healthy sports, and in Sabbath-school distinguished himself in Bible study, so that it became a common remark among those that knew him, "That boy was born for a preacher."

The early death of his mother cast a great shadow on his young life. He was devoted to her, as she was to her children. He felt entirely forsaken. In his sorrow he said he wished he had as much evidence of love to God as he had of love to his mother. For a time he seemed not only motherless but godless. But he came out of that spiritual conflict stronger, and with the glad cry of the Psalmist, "He set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings. And He hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God." At the age of sixteen he was baptized in the stream flowing through his native place. Standing by the edge of the stream, and in the presence of a great gathering of the young people, who had always looked up to him as a leader, he preached a sermon which produced such marked effects that a revival ensued that put a new life into the old church.

His great desire now was for an education. He attended the Southington Academy, and then made known to his father his desire for a collegiate education. Great was his disappointment when his father told him he had nothing with which to help him; but that night his elder brother brought out one hundred dollars which he had saved, and took off his silver watch and gave him, and with this equipment he started for Columbian College, Washington. This long journey was partly pedestrian. Here he was offered advantages unsurpassed: in addition to the usual advantages of a university, the opportunity to study men as well as books. It was in the days of Webster, Clay, and Calhoun; and the great debates which have become historic made a lasting impression on young Rollin.

During his student life here he preached at the Navy Yard Church. One of the substantial fruits of that ministry was the conversion of Leonard A. Grimes, who had been a slave, was then a Washington hackman, and who was for so many years the honored pastor of the Twelfth Baptist Church (colored) of Boston. In 1830 Dr. Neale graduated with the first honors of the class, and in the autumn of that year entered Newton Theological Seminary, near Boston.

In 1833 he was ordained as pastor of the Baptist Church in South Boston. Afterward he accepted a call to New Haven, where his ministry was very effective. Here it bore fruit again in the conversion of Phineas Stowe, who afterward became pastor of the Boston Bethel, and was one of the most useful men of his day.

In 1837 Dr. Neale accepted the pastorate of

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF BOSTON.

It was "an era of union, of denominational peace and progress, of revivals of religion, of missionary concerts and spiritual ingatherings. The old vestry of the First Church became a true Bethel, not merely in the etymological sense of the word, house of God, but in its more modern sense, a rallying point for the sons of Zebulon, as Father Taylor used to denote the men of the sea." Here began his life-long sympathy with Bethel work. He was now in the prime of his powers, and his sympathy was so broad that all classes naturally looked up to him. In the second year of his pastorate there was a great revival, and in 1842 a still greater. In that year two hundred and seventy-four were added to the church. Of these a large proportion were heads of families and business men in the vigor of life.

In 1840 began

in theological questions in Boston. Never was there a deeper popular interest than at that time. Theodore Parker, by his eloquence and bold speculations, was drawing the minds of many to these subjects.

Jacob Knapp was so stirring the hearts of men of all classes that even Channing was drawn to his meetings, and came away so impressed that he said, "That man is doing good; let him alone." Dr. Kirk was preaching as an evangelist. It was a time of intense spiritual activity. The very opposition to evangelical Christianity quickened into life elements in the church that had been weak. Dr Neale entered with whole heart into the work, and with others reaped large accessions.

In 1843 he went abroad. He went to Copenhagen, to visit two persecuted brethren—Rev. Mr Oncken and Dr. Hoby. He was disappointed to find they had been arrested and sent away. In his letter he says: "It now became my turn to appea

BEFORE THE POLICE.

They detained me until 9 o'clock Saturday night questioning me about my faith. I told them I wa a Baptist minister from Boston, United States o America. 'Well, my good sir,' said the head man of police, 'what has brought you to Copenhagen?' 'To comfort my brethren in Israel no harm in that, I hope?' The officer shrugged his shoulders and said, 'You, can't stay, sir, unles you promise neither to preach nor administer th ordinance of baptism.' I told him I had no objections to those conditions, provided I might b permitted to talk to my brethren on the subject o religion. 'Oh, well,' said he, 'you may talk a much as you choose; we in Denmark are a peopl that don't make a fuss about little things.'"

In 1857 he delivered the Dudleian lecture befor Harvard College, Cambridge, a series founded to expose the errors of the Church of Rome. Shortl afterward he was awarded the degree of D.D. b Harvard College.

In 1874 he crossed the continent, and received an ovation from the Baptists in California.

His last sermon was preached at Wollaston Heights, February 16th, 1879, from the text, "Th Word of God is not bound." It was a plea for th Southern Baptist Mission in Rome.

He afterward addressed the students of Newton Seminary. On the 18th of September, 1879, h passed away. On the third Sunday of October 1880, on the forty-second anniversary of his settlement, a memorial service was held at the First Baptist Church. Rev. Wm. Hague, D.D., his lifelong friend, delivered an address, which is about to be published, and which will prove full of interes to all who knew Dr. Neale.

He was called by pulpit and press

THE APOSTLE OF CHARITY.

He was the living embodiment of Paul's famou chapter. His appearance betokened his character He was tall and of commanding presence, but hi face wore such a genial smile that every one wa drawn to him. His sunny disposition seemed t convey itself to any assembly he entered.

He was naturally sensitive, but he said he carrie two pockets, one with a hole in it, into which h dropped all disagreeable things.

When asked how he happened to be pastor o one church so long, he said, "Well, when th church got angry and wanted me to go, I wouldn't and when I got angry and wanted to go, the wouldn't let me. We never both got angry at th same time." He disliked to say no, and when aske to commend a book, once wrote, "If any one want this book, I know the bearer to be such a goo Christian that it would be a pleasure to buy anything from so good a man." As he could not commend the book he commended the man.

His colleague once asked him how he managed to keep so cheerful and uncomplaining when h knew at the time he was bearing heavy burdens The answer was significant: "I never tell m troubles except on my knees." He kept his fac toward the throne; and it was the light of th throne that fell upon him and was reflected o those who loved him.

A Noteworthy Fact which has Occasioned comment in the financial world occurred last week For the first time in thirty years the price of English Consols has risen above their face value. Tha people are so eager to become creditors of the British Government as to pay a premium for the privilege, shows that other investments, such as the land must be unremunerative in that country, as th Government is only paying three per cent interes to its creditors.

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paull.

rlando Stanley's Injuries—Salome's Tender Care of Him—His Heart Softened by her Song —His Death—The Change in Mr. Mitchell—An Excursion to Rochester.

SLOWLY and solemnly they brought in the ounded man. So slowly, so solemnly, that it rought back only too vividly to the mind of poor mily Anerley the return of her beloved father's ody to his once happy home years before. She at down and burst into tears.

"Please lay him on the bed," said Salome as e bearers entered the house and ascended the airs.

Orlando Stanley, as he lay upon the snowy d in his wife's room, was a pitiable object. A eadful gash across his face, and his head; which d been cut open, partly bandaged with cloths, rtly discolored with bruises, and his hair matted th the blood that had flowed freely from his ounds. He was unconscious. Oh, if he had been ounded in a noble cause, how Salome could have nored every disfiguring scar! but here was the utilated victim of some drunken brawl, here was other self-immolation on the altar of Bacchus!

The doctor spoke to Salome for some minutes, d expressed his wish to stay in the house all night watch every change in the unhappy victim of his n excesses, for he was in extreme danger.

Emily felt she could not leave Salome at this cture; and Cecil only wrung Salome's hand, une to trust himself to speak to her, before he tened away to catch his train in order to spare mother all anxiety.

Delirium set in on the return of Orlando Stanley sensibility, and increased his danger. Where how he had spent the last three weeks would bably always remain a mystery. His gold ch and every article of jewellery were gone, had doubtless furnished the means of his dech. He had, at any rate, been brought now n the very same public-house in which Mr. t had sought him. There had been a drunken rrel between a young officer and himself. The er had used his sword, first to inflict the ugly nd on his face and then to knock him violently he head. He had been too much intoxicated m his blows straight in return, and the officer escaped serious damage. Only when the y reached a dreadful height were the police for and the parties separated.

e landlady had remembered the name of Stanand the address that Mr. Fleet had happened ention in his talk with her, and thus he had brought home by the surgeon and policeman. W it to die? A case of aggravated assault, if f manslaughter, was evidently pending against fficer, and the authorities had him in custody. rough all that first long anxious night of den and fever, and for many another that fold, Salome watched beside him with the den of a good woman, praying for at least some n of reason and knowledge, when she might at him to cling to the Saviour, who never reto listen to any of His repentant children.

ily Anerley remained for a day or two, and as her strength was not sufficient to undermuch nursing in such a desperate case, she ned home.

e sick man never seemed easy unless Salome y him. When she rested, as she was occaly compelled to do, he was always so restless ncomfortable as to endanger every meagre e of recovery. In every lucid interval, when quietly on the bed, Salome read to him the d passages from the Bible which she deemed suitable to his sore human need. Sometimes ng to him. The glorious voice that had ated Cecil Anerley like heavenly music, that armed the babies and nurses at the crêche, ntranced the forlorn candidates for free asts at the mission hall, was once more used Master's service by the sick bed of her hus- She was singing once to him, with indeble pathos and tenderness, "Tell me the d story." She had taken his worn, wasted hand in hers, and felt a warmer glow of compassion and love toward him than she had been able to do for many and many a day.

Just as she reached the lines

> "Remember I'm the sinner
> That Jesus died to save,"

Orlando Stanley turned his eyes upon her—he had no power to turn his wounded head—and smiled gently. Then he gasped once or twice, sighed heavily, and died. The wasted life had returned to the God who gave it.

"She had her meed, one smile in death."

Mrs. Mitchell, after hovering for months between life and death at Canterbury, now engendering hope, now causing her friends to almost utterly despair, rallied with the genial warmth of summer, and began to think and speak cheerfully of full restoration to her loved ones.

But the precious lessons of her sickness had not been learned in vain by any of her family, and especially by her husband. He had so nearly lost the treasure that made life radiant and beautiful to him that he could never again even appear to prize it so lightly as he once had done. He sought her company continually, asked her advice, took her with him whenever practicable, and made her the acknowledged helpmeet in all matters that her education and piety fitted her to become. He had realized the selfishness on his part which had been the only cloud on their happy union, and in the cultivation of which she herself had not been free from blame. He had now sought in the strength of his God to conquer it.

The Rev. Rowland Mitchell, like every other Christian who has let a weed grow apace in his garden of Christian graces, found he had set himself a hard task—a task which he was utterly incompetent to perform without the aid of the Heavenly Gardener; but by diligent, watchful, prayerful effort—by which we are told "to work out our salvation with fear and trembling"—selfishness, that most hideous of all vices, was bravely attacked, and by very slow degrees was eradicated. All this inner conflict, all this combat with self, increased his power both as a preacher and a minister. His sermons had always been interesting and eloquent; now the experiences of the past year rendered them arousing and comforting, piquant with suggestion and force. In the pastoral visits he paid to his congregation, men and women were amazed at his greater power to enlist their sympathies, to engage their attention, and to understand their needs.

Constance Anerley had said to Mrs. Mitchell during that lady's illness that she could not even regard her employer as her friend. She now learned to do so, and to feel that he was a wise counsellor and adviser in every difficulty. She felt that his sermons helped her and stimulated her to seek the highest and purest motives for every action, while in his own growth in gentleness, kindness, unselfishness, she saw the very best proof that any one can furnish of the reality of Christianity and its vital influence upon the life that is yielded to its power.

It had not been thought advisable that Mrs. Mitchell should leave the quiet home of her mother at Canterbury until her health was thoroughly re-established, and it was generally her wish to have Constance and some of the children with her. It was one morning early in the autumn, when plans were being made for a return to Brighton ere long, that Constance said to Mrs. Mitchell,

"One day before we leave Canterbury altogether, Mrs. Mitchell, I want you to let me take Claudia, Esther, and Robbie and go over and spend a good long day at Rochester with poor, dear Salome."

"Certainly, Constance. But had you not better go alone, instead of burdening yourself with the children? I can look after them for you for one day."

"No, thank you," replied Constance decidedly. "I have quite set my mind on giving them this charming holiday. I know Robbie will enjoy seeing the pigeons in the old tower of the castle."

The mother smiled. "You are very kind to the dears, Constance. I need not say be careful of the old castle, for you are always so careful and thoughtful, dear. I don't know what I should do without you, Constance."

The only answer the young governess made was to throw her arms round Mrs. Mitchell and kiss her repeatedly.

"And how is your poor, dear friend, Salome Stanley? Have you had a letter lately?" asked Mrs. Mitchell kindly.

"To-day, and she seems still so dreadfully sad that a visit from our three bright children will do her ever so much good. Do you think I might go to-morrow, while this glorious sunshine lasts?"

"There is nothing to prevent, my dear Constance. But you had better write to say you are going."

"Oh, no; I want to have a bit of fun, and give her a real, genuine surprise," said Constance in a spirit of girlish mischief.

The proposal for a day's holiday which should include so many charming incidents—a railway ride, the examination of an old castle and a cathedral that, however old in its history, was new to them—delighted the children, especially when its bright hours were to be spent with Constance, for their governess had awakened quite a passionate enthusiasm for herself in the young Mitchells, and though Robbie's love for her did not, unfortunately, always make him inclined to obey her, yet he was one of the most eager to assert his right to her company.

"Do go dreadfully early in the morning, that we may have the longer day, Miss Anerley, there's a dear, good creature!" he pleaded, in his most coaxing tones with his handsome little face upturned to hers, and his roguish dark eyes intently watching her eyes to see what sort of an answer she would give.

"Before breakfast?" queried Constance, smiling.

"Yes, that would be ever so jolly," answered Robbie.

"Will you be prepared to go without breakfast, then," asked Constance, "if Mrs. Stanley has none to give you?"

"Oh, well—no," said Robbie, decidedly. "I don't want to go without altogether. But we can get buns in a shop, and I like buns ever so well, much better than bread. Give me as many buns as I want for breakfast, won't you, Miss Anerley?"

"Silly boy!" said Claudia, from the depths of her maturer experience; "you would be sure to be ill if you ate so many buns—wouldn't he, Miss Anerley?"

"Just let me try," exclaimed Robbie.

"No, Robbie," said Constance, "I have no wish to be troubled with the care of a greedy boy who has made himself sick. I shall certainly not feed you on buns; it would be a poor beginning for a day of busy sight-seeing. If I decide to go by that early train, we must look about when we get there and find a place to have some breakfast before we go to Mrs. Stanley's."

"Yes, that will be fun," responded Robbie. "I have never had breakfast anywhere but in our own house and at grandma's. I should like to know how other sorts of people manage it."

Constance laughed heartily. "So you shall to-morrow, Robbie, if the weather keeps as fine as I expect it will be, and if we are all up in time for the train. Mind, don't oversleep yourselves."

Very early, indeed, on the following morning, before it was at all necessary to arise, there was a hurried tap on the door of Constance's room, and she was reminded of the important journey before her. She looked at her watch. "It is too soon yet, Robbie," she called out; "wait till the clock strikes six, and then you may get up."

Soon after seven they were at the station waiting for their train. The bright beauty of the morning was reflected in the happy, sunshiny face of Constance and her three pupils.

Arrived at Rochester, after an hour in which the three children had chattered to their hearts' content in the most exuberant of spirits, they sought about at once for an eating-house, Robbie being by this time, as he abruptly expressed the fact, "awfully hungry."

THE PARADISE OF FOOLS.

A Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken, M. A.

"He came to Himself,"—LUKE 15 : 17.

An Interpolation in a Hand-bill—The World a Great Lunatic Asylum—I. The Disease—Typical Lunatics—Dangerous—Harmless—Self-complacent—Lunacy a Profitable Study—The First Stage, Pleasure—The World's Dire Bankruptcy Court—The Second Stage, Business—II. The Crisis—The Lunatic Thinking—He Discovers Himself a Slave—III. Recovery—1. He Realizes the Past—2. He Understands the Present—3. He Dreads the Future—The Vision of Home—the Father Justified—Himself Condemned—A Parisian Belle—Her Conversion at a Mission Service.

SOME years ago, I was conducting a mission in the North of England, and as is customary on such an occasion, a large number of hand-bills were distributed right and left announcing the services. The vicar of the parish where I was laboring received one of these hand-bills back in an envelope, with two words written upon it. Underneath the words "A mission" was written "for lunatics"; so that the hand-bill read "A mission for lunatics."

I do not suppose that the writer had any particular thought of telling the truth, but it was very startling to think how near the truth it came; for in one sense, I think we may say that every mission we hold is a mission for lunatics.

Ah! as those bright angels of glory hover round this sinful world of ours, don't you think it must sometimes present to them the aspect of one great lunatic asylum, wherein are found, as it were, lunatics of every grade and of every form and description? How wondrous strange it must seem to them that such a grand possibility should be brought within the grasp of mankind—though here on trial only for a few short hours, that it should be possible for us to make our calling and election sure, to live in the sunlight of God's favor—to do a work for eternity, which God himself should delight in, and ultimately to enter into the joy of our Lord: and yet men and women are found all over the world who are ready to turn their back upon this splendid opportunity; to turn their backs upon the possibility of a splendid career, and to bring down ruin and blight, and desolation and weariness, and despair and death and damnation upon their own souls. Lunatics indeed! Yes, plenty of them.

I. THE DISEASE.

There is your dangerous lunatic, whom we have to curb and fetter, and fasten the manacles upon, for fear he should do injury to society at large, goaded by passion, frenzied by ambition. Such a man is regarded as a sort of animal. Ah! there is many a man who has done a great deal worse than wild beasts. What about fields dyed with carnage, towns sacked and burned, homes desolated, hearts broken!—things of this kind have been the work of your dangerous lunatic. Men who, as I have said, blinded by their lusts to all higher considerations, trample upon the first rights of mankind in their ruthless desire to gratify themselves.

And then there is your harmless lunatic, a much more common specimen than the other, and much more frequently to be met with—a man whose life is simply inane and insipid, lived without any particular object. You see a picture of what his career is as you watch the butterfly floating from flower to flower and sipping the dew, then, by and by, when the first blast of winter comes, shrivelling up and dying away. Even so there is many a life which cannot otherwise be described than as a life of nothingness. Perhaps, if you ask them what they are aiming at, they will tell you they are not troubling themselves about any particular object in life. They are not, perhaps, endowed with any extraordinary talent, and their lives run on in an easy, quiet course, and when death comes they have nothing to show for them: they have lived simply in vain.

Then again, there are your self-complacent lunatics; and they form a very large class. You are well aware that if you were to go down to Colney Hatch Lunatic Asylum, near London, you would find a large number of people there who imagine that they belong to the small number of people in the world who are really sane, and that their fellow-men are really so insane as to keep them in a state of chronic confinement, whereas if they only had their due they would be among the most distinguished of mankind. There are very few madhouses in our land but what contain people who suppose themselves to be kings, and who fancy they have a right to sit upon the throne, but that their subjects are too mad to offer them their due; noblemen who are possessed of large estates, but whose tenants are too dishonest to pay them the rent they have a rightful claim to. So these poor unfortunates persuade themselves they suffer through the madness of other people, whereas they are mad and other people are sane.

So as we pass along the journey of life, how many do we meet with who have got it into their heads that they are about the only sane people to be met with—sane just because they pooh-pooh the realities of eternity; sane because they turn their backs on things that most require consideration.

For instance the man who wrote those two words on that bill of which I have spoken, no doubt fancied he was doing a very clever thing. I am very sure of one thing, and that is that in writing those words he was just giving expression to his own feeling about the matter. He regarded, and was not by any means solitary in regarding, those who cared about eternal things, as mere lunatics, and people who would go to mission and evangelistic services to hear the Word of Life proclaimed be regarded as lunatics, whereas he himself held his head high; and I dare say he would have been ready to spout scepticism to any extent if you had only listened to him. He doubtless considered himself a specimen of what humanity may possible rise to if it is only educated enough.

I often wonder what the angels think of such men. Do you think they can appear to them otherwise than as poor blind lunatics? Men on trial for eternity, and yet giving themselves such poor, pitiful, paltry airs, that while they flaunt their self-conceit before the eyes of God and man, the one brief opportunity of life passes unimproved, and they pass on to doom!

Well, now, it is not an altogether unprofitable thing to study

THE CAREER OF LUNATICS.

The parable from which our text is taken describes the course of the self-opinionated prodigal young man. Each of the steps which, in his unfilial and foolish conduct he took, were indications of what may still be described as moral lunacy. He might have been perfectly happy in his father's house; his elder brother was; he wanted for nothing. When he does come to himself, you know, he looks back upon his father's house, and says: "How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger."

His father denied him nothing that was good or reasonable for him, for his father was evidently much attached to him. The first step in which this young man was showing his lunacy was one in which he thought he was showing his wisdom. So he got away from his father's presence; he was really going to enjoy himself; he would not allow himself to be fettered by the restraints which that father's presence might impose upon him, and "he went into a far country, and there wasted his substance in riotous living."

There is many a man who regards himself as a sensible sort of fellow just because he does the same. You tell me honestly and bluntly you do not trouble yourself about religion; you have taken the way of Cain, that leads out from the presence of the Father, and in doing so you think you have been demonstrating your own wisdom, whereas the truth is you have been exhibiting your lunacy.

The effect of spiritual lunacy is that we are continually losing all that is really worth having, continually depriving ourselves of all that God will enrich us with until we end our miserable career in which we call hell. As we look upon the prodigal son in a far country, see him at the festive board, and listen to the laughter of fools, what does th world say to it, or the fast young man of London "I wish I had the chance, I would do the sam If my father would leave me a fortune, as that fe low's father did, I know what I should do with it. He just played the part of a sensible man, yo think. When God looked down upon him H thought him a fool. When the blessed ange looked down upon him they thought him a foo When the devils of hell looked at him they thougl him a fool, and when he looked at himself l thought himself a fool.

Ah! my friends, our opinions of ourselv change strangely when once the light of truth b gins to flash into our souls. But he wasted h substance, and it was gone, and then the next thir this sensible young man did was to try and subs tute labor for pleasure, and to find in a life of to what he had not found in a life of delirious excit ment. Many a wise, sensible man does that. H runs after all kinds of phantasies in his early year Life had been anything but satisfactory, and no what is he to do? Gray hairs are beginning to a pear; it is high time he should make his way life, and get into a higher social position. Wh do you do it for? Well, really, in order that th wants of your souls may be gratified by the toil they never having been gratified by the pleasur you have been seeking. It sounds very natura but this is only of the man's lunacy.

The man was just as much a lunatic when l went and hired himself out to a citizen in tl country as when he went down to that chambe When he began to feel the terrible pinch of fami there was only one course for him that was real wise—to go back to his father's house if haply h father might yet forgive him. He gazed arou him, and wherever his eye fell there was desol tion; he saw his fellow-men carried away towa the grave by scores day after day. He kne sooner or later he must perish for want. Surel surely wisdom might have suggested to him t necessity of not losing so much as one hour. H surely ought to have felt, "I dare not trifle li this. My strength is waning; the fever is eati out my life." He ought to have argued so; b he went and joined himself to a citizen of th country, who sent him into a field to feed swin and no man gave unto him.

That is just what many a young man does. Y have found that youth with all its excitement a lures has not really satisfied you, but the heart still empty. Well, what is to be done? Plun into worldly business? Substitute the excitemer of commerce for the excitements of the billiar room, or if you will, gamble on the Stock Exchan instead of at the horse-race? Let it be a lit soberer kind of dissipation; or, perhaps, take t yoke upon your neck of an industrious life, a work so hard that you shall have no time for ar thing else.

So men plunge into a life of activity, and imagi that if they feel they can get away from themsel it will be all right, while all the time they a trifling with their own soul and sinning agair their own nature, and when God looks down up them He still thinks them mad—mad—mad, blin ed by the great deceiver, the god of this wo casting a cloud of deceit around them, and leadi them on further from their own interests becau further and further from God. Well, now, su were the steps which this wise man had take as the world would have considered him. Su were the steps which this lunatic had taken, God considered him. Who was right?

II. THE CRISIS.

There comes a crisis in his history—the migh famine is raging all round; there he sits lonely a desolate in the field, his hopes are blighted, l joys are gone, his heart is aching, his body stricken, his strength is waning—himself! he already beginning to die. There he sits; he l gins to turn over his life. Ah! it's a grand thi when a man begins to turn over the record of l life. It is a grand thing when men begin to thin Oh! if we could only get men to think! It is t miserable wretched thoughtlessness that destr more souls than all the wilful sins you can commit. He has made fine work of it, after all; he turned his back upon his father because he was going to be independent, and now he finds himself a slave, or no better. That is a very solemn discovery for a man to make. You turn your back upon God, my friend, in order that you may take your own way and follow your own course.

Are you a free agent? Go and ask the drunkard who staggers through our streets whether he s a free agent? Go and ask the young man who ıas pampered his own lusts and passions until at ast they become supreme within his nature. 'Oh!" said a young man to me the other night, vith tears in his eyes, "I have lost all power of elf-control. If I go through the street, and my ye falls on an object that awakens my lust I feel arried away, and have no power of controlling ıyself." "Know ye not that to whomsoever ye ield yourselves slaves to obey, his slave ye are hom ye obey, whether of sin unto death, or obe- ience unto righteousness."

And that, my brothers, is the picture of some of ɔu—God knows who. Oh! may He search your earts while I am speaking to you. This young an had claimed his substance and left his father, eling like a very rich man, with all that his father d given him. And now? His only substance e those husks that he looks at, the husks that he gnawing to try and satisfy the cravings of his rrible hunger—the gnawings of his appetite. en so, when we turn our backs upon God, we make fine work of it. We claim our substance, d lo! our substance begins to waste away in our nds; either it disappears from us altogether, or ses to give the satisfaction we thought it was ing to give.

III. RECOVERY.

Then and there it was that the change took ce. Starting up as from a troublous fevered am, the long delirium of life at last lifting up m off him and breaking away, the young man nes to himself, and he finds out this grand and sible career of his, on which he had plumed self—this life which he had elected to live, and the sake of which he had sacrificed so much—t after all it had been one great tainted lie, and urns from it with reprobation and disdain!" le came to himself!"

. First of all he came to himself with regard to past. What a history it was! What a miser- tragedy! His memory wanders back toward sunny days of his early boyhood. He thinks of t he once was, the innocent days he spent in society of his father and his friends, and then vision travels on until he sees himself starting his father's house, and there rises up in his d the recollection of the tears which stood in old man's eyes—what a fool I am! I might known he loved me. I could not look into ace; I could not watch that hand, as it trem- and grasped mine without knowing he loved and I turned my back upon him. I would not to my own conscience, which told me to stop e I was. Fool that I was!

He came to himself," and now he begins to his own folly. His vision wanders on further ns of profligacy and dissipation; he sees him- n the midst of a mirthful crowd—everybody plimenting him; smiles all round; pleasant , and happy words; and as he looks at it all tes it. He turns away from it with revulsion. that I am! Didn't I know that all these ds were merely dancing a masquerade round s it were?

So the light began to shine in upon him, and sion wandered on till the days of adversity be- o come, and he saw friends dropping off, and to be in want. At last the past glides into resent, and as he had come to himself with ct to the past, so he now comes to himself respect to the present. Great God! Where ? In a far country, without one soul to be iend; without one hope to cheer me; starv- famishing! dying! and I have brought it myself! Yes; he "comes to himself" with to the present. There is that within him tells him his days are numbered, except ow or another he can escape from that terrible region. Death is striking down its victims all around him, and he feels he must come to himself. His strength is going away from him, his eyes are swimming, his head is dizzy; soon, he feels, it will be all over; and if some desperate effort is not made, soon his strength will pass from him, and with his strength his hope, and with his hope his life, and then

DEATH CLAIMS ITS VICTIM.

Oh! my brothers, it is a terrible thing to stand face to face with death; and it is a still more terrible thing to stand face to face with doom. Now, my brothers, have you come to yourself? As your eye wanders back upon the history of your past life, are you ready, like this young man, to say, "What a fool I have been! My life might have been a blessing, but it has been a curse. The devil himself has numbered me among the bands of his votaries, and sent me forth into the world to be his own tool and cat's-paw, to do his own detestable work, scattering damnation wherever I have gone. My time is lost, my affections have been squandered, my talents wasted. What a fool I have been?"

Oh! it's a solemn moment in a man's life when he finds out his own folly, when the long delirium of a lifetime is actually lifted up, and we begin to see things as they actually are, and we cry out, "Oh God, oh God, I have been walking away from Thee, and have lived in vain."

3. But once again. He came to himself with respect to the future. One thing he saw clearly—it was no use going on like that: he was dying; he had been gnawing and gnawing at those husks long enough, and the result was

STARVATION.

Something must be done, or else death must be faced. The inevitable had to be contemplated; but what was to be done? Should he go back again to his old friends? Ah! they had already turned their backs upon him. It was no use going to them. Should he endeavor to find some other employment? Nay, but in that famined land there was no friend to give him any. Should he sit there and die? It was a hard thing to come to that decision. We none of us like to give up life; we cling to it very tightly; very reluctant are we to part with it, though life may be burning with agony, as his was. What was to be done? Was there any other alternative?

Then it was that there rose up in his mind, like a dream of the past,

THE VISION OF HIS OLD HOME.

He sees the happy faces of the servants passing to and fro in his father's mansion; he hears the voices of song among those with whom all was bright, and sunny, and fair, and joyful. Then there rises up once again before him his father's face—that venerable countenance, with the same look of love upon it which it bore when first his younger son turned his back upon him. He loved him then; peradventure he loves him still. And so a ray of hope pierces through the gloom. "If there is any choice for me at all, any door of escape, any possibility of redemption, it lies in that one word, father. Perhaps he does love me still; perhaps he still would be ready to hold out a hand to me. If he do, I am saved; if he do not, I perish."

Then and there, as he turns the matter over, my friends, there is yet a further change takes place in him. He has come to himself with regard to his own life; at last he comes to himself with regard to his father. "What! It was a lie after all. I thought him a tyrant; he was my best friend. I thought he grudged me happiness; he only wanted to make me happy. I remember he never crossed my will unless it was for my good. He never denied me anything unless it would be for my harm to have it. He was always tender, always kind. I have belied him. I have libelled his character. I have denied his true self. My father! My own dear father! I have been a black-hearted base fellow, but

NOW I SEE IT ALL!

The fault all lies with me. He is not to blame. I have painted him in false coloring, and represented him as being what he never was. Father!"

As he utters that word, the old associations rush into his mind, and visions of his infancy rise upon him, and he thinks of those sunny days he spent playing on his father's knee, and there and then the long weary illusion passes away and he begins to see things as they actually are.

Well, that is what I am praying for and hoping for concerning you and many more. Oh! my friends, I want you to come to yourselves, not only to right views about yourselves, but about your Father. The Devil told you He was a tyrant. I want you to see that He is a friend. The Devil told you He does not want you to be happy. I want you to see that He desires your happiness supremely. The Devil told you He grudged you what is good for you. I want you to see that He gave His own Son that you might have all that is good for you. Do you believe it? Oh, if I could conclude this sermon by bringing every man and woman who hears me just to believe that God loves you, what a meeting we would have! What joy there would be in heaven and in your own hearts!

and fashion, moving in the highest circles in Paris and leading a poor, gay, butterfly life, was ill, and lay on her bed greatly distressed. One day her sisters came bursting into the room: "Marie! Have you heard the news?" No, what is the matter?" "Oh, there's some mad fellow come here, preaching the Gospel; he can't speak a word of French, and a Frenchman has to interpret for him. We are going to hear him, it is the greatest fun in the world." And then they bounced out of the room and left her. But they had hardly done so before there arose in the poor invalid's mind an irrepressible desire to go and hear the preacher, too, and at last her curiosity became so strong that she rang the bell, and said to her maid, "I want you to dress me, and order the carriage—I am going out." "My dear lady, you are really not well enough to go out." "Never you mind, I want to go out." And she went, and the coachman drove her to where the service was being held. There was a vacant seat near the platform, and after some little difficulty she succeeded in reaching it.

Prayer was offered, and a hymn was sung in her own language, and by that time she was somewhat solemnized. Then the preacher came to the front of the platform, looked her full in the face, as if there was no other person in the hall, and remained perfectly silent for a moment or two; then he said: "Poor sinner! God loves thee." She afterward stated, "I don't know what more the preacher said. I dare say he said a great deal. All I know is I sat there sobbing as if my heart would break, and all the time those words kept ringing in my ears—'Poor sinner! God loves thee." It seemed to me as if the whole of my past life was moving before my eyes, all my worldliness, my gayety, my sins, my folly. Oh my God! I thought, have I been turning my back upon Thee all these years, and yet Thou hast been loving me! Art Thou loving me still?" She said,

"THOSE FEW WORDS BROKE MY HEART,

I got back to my own chamber, I know not how, but I found myself kneeling and sobbing by my own bedside, the tears were flowing down my cheeks, and I kept repeating over and over again the words, 'God loves me; in spite of my sin God loves me.' 'Oh my God! my God!' I cried, 'if Thou lov'st me, then from this time forward I give myself to Thee; from this time forward I am Thine.'"

God grant that we may thus come to ourselves to-night. Sinner! God loves you. You may be a proud-hearted sinner, but God loves you in spite of your pride; you may be an impure sinner, but God loves you in spite of your impurity; you may be a worldly minded sinner, but God loves you in spite of your worldly mindedness; you may be an indifferent and careless sinner, but God loves you in spite of your indifference and carelessness. Oh! that you may come to yourself now, and see that love as it really is, fall on your knees in adoring gratitude, grasp the Saviour's feet, wet them in your contrite tears, as you rejoice to own that God loves you, even you.

CURRENT EVENTS.

President Hayes, in his Last Message to Congress discusses an unusually large number of topics but they are all of national importance. Prominent among them is the subject of Mormonism, on which the President urges that vigorous measuresbe promptly taken. During his recent western tour Mr. Hayes personally investigated the state of the Utah Territory, and was astonished at the progress the pernicious and immoral doctrines of Mormonism are making. He expresses his belief that the United States authorities have made faithful and zealous efforts to suppress polygamy but despair of success while Mormons have control of the juries. In this position the President says: "I recommend that Congress provide for the government of Utah by a governor and judges, or commissioners, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. If, however, it is deemed best to continue the exing form of local government, I recommend that the right to vote, hold office, and sit on juries in the territory of Utah be confined to those who neither practice not uphold polygamy. If thorough measures are adopted, it is believed that within a few years the evils which now afflict Utah will be eradicated, and that this Territory will in good time become one of the most prosperous and attractive of the new States of the Union."

"The Spoils System" in the Civil Service received emphatic condemnation in the Presidential message. Referring to the system of competitive examinations established in New York Mr. Hayes expressed his approval of it, and recommends an annual appropriation of $25,000 to defray the expenses of a commission to devise a scheme for extending the system throughout the country. He would have each public officer free to express his political opinions and to use his means for their advancement, but he would also have him feel safe in refusing all demands upon his salary for political purposes. The first step in the reform of the Civil Service he believes must be "a complete divorce between Congress and the Executive in the matter of appointments."

Other Topics of the Message Refer to the Indian question, in which the President concurs in the view taken by Mr. Schurz, to which we alluded last week. On the subject of the Panama Canal Mr. Hayes still adheres to the opinion he expressed some time ago and which is known as the Monroe doctrine; but as it is proposed to construct the canal with private funds, it is difficult to see what ground the President has for his misgivings. On maritime questions the President appears to realize the need for reform, but suggests no scheme which touches the main cause of the trouble. On the troublesome silver dollar question Mr. Hayes advises that the bullion value of the silver dollar be made equal to that of the gold dollar, but fails to perceive that the silver dollar cannot be made popular by that process, and that the gold standard is at present the only one available in dealing with other nations. He advises the withdrawal of the greenback dollar from circulation. On both recommendations he is at issue with Mr. Sherman.

A Sensation in Political Circles was Produced last week by the appointment of Mr. Allan Campbell as Comptroller of New York, in the room of Mr. John Kelly. Recent events give a national significance to this local appointment. Mr. Kelly was known in New York as "the Boss," and his downfall is the topic of general interest in other large cities where there are also Bosses, Democratic or Republican. His exclusion from office was effected by a coalition of Republicans with Irving Hall Democrats and some disaffected members of Tammany Hall. Mr. Kelly's popularity in the Democratic Party has rapidly waned since the Presidential election, and the opposition to him has been daily gaining strength. The Governorship of the State was lost to the party through his direct action, and it was charged against him that in the Presidential contest, the vote of New York State, to which Gen. Garfield owes his election, would have been cast for Gen. Hancock had Mr. Kelly been prudent, and faithful to his party. To the responsibility for these party disasters was added the charge of arrogance and a dictatorial spirit displayed in the Tammany organization by which he alienated some of his supporters there. Then a leading daily journal asserted that in the record of the city expenditure, there were items as fraudulent as those of the days of Tweed, and contended that the present disgraceful maladministration of the city's finances was due to Mr. Kelly's influence. Under the combined attack, the man whom the members of Tammany have been accustomed to call "our honored leader" has fallen. Two lessons should be learned from the event. First that the position known as "Boss" is alien to our institutions; and second, that no official, however powerful, is safe if his character for integrity falls under suspicion.

The Prohibition Clause in the Kansas Constitution was carried by a woman's influence, as Governor St. John related the occurrence at the Congress of the New York State Temperance Society, in Cooper Union, on December 6th. In order to submit an amendment of the State Constitution the law requires the votes of two thirds of the members of the Legislature. But when the Legislature met to propose the absolute prohibition of the sale of intoxicants, after a two hours' debate, it was found that the ayes wanted one vote to make a two thirds majority. The party of temperance were in doubt what to do when a little black-eyed woman hurried along the aisle and going up to her husband pleaded with him with a woman's energy to change his vote from no to aye. He yielded, the amendment was submitted to the people, and passed triumphantly.

The City of Pensacola, Fla., was Destroyed by fire on the night of December 10th. The fire originated in a confectionery store, and might have been easily extinguished, but the steam fire engine in the vicinity was out of order and was in the machine shop undergoing repairs. Before it could be set to work the fire spread rapidly; the Custom House, Post-Office, the newpaper and telegraph offices, the principal bank and five blocks comprising the chief stores of the city were destroyed. All the Custom House papers were lost but Mr. Larne, the county clerk, saved the records of his office, though while he was so engaged his own house and all it contained was consumed. The brief telegram announcing the disaster says: There is not a newspaper office, job office, drug store or stationery store left in the city.

The Fishery Dispute known as the Fortune Bay outrage forms the subject of a dispatch published last week from Lord Granville, the British Minister of Foreign Affairs, to our government. It will be remembered that Lord Salisbury, who preceded Lord Granville as Foreign Minister, rejected the American claim with some asperity. Lord Granville's letter is worded more courteously, and admits that the American fishermen whose nets were destroyed are entitled to compensation, which the British Government is ready to make. To avoid future troubles of the same nature Lord Granville wishes it to be clearly understood that the treaty gives the same rights to American as to colonial fishermen, but both must submit to the same local regulations, any infringment of which will be punished in the one case as in the other.

The Week of Prayer. 1881.—The Evangelical Alliance, as representing Protestant Christendom throughout the world, have for years suggested a programme for the Week of Prayer, so that, as far as possible, all praying people might unite on the same day in the same petitions. The Branch Alliance of the United States adopt, with slight modifications, its programme, and suggest the following themes and order for the approaching Week of Prayer, January 2–9, viz.:

JANUARY 2.—Theme: Christ the only hope of a lost world.

MONDAY, 3.—Thanksgiving for the blessings, temporal and spiritual, of the past year, and prayer for their continuance.

TUESDAY, 4.—Humiliation and confession on account of individual, social, and national sins.

WEDNESDAY, 5.—Prayer for the Church of Christ, its unity and purity, its ministry; and for revivals of religion.

THURSDAY, 6.—Christian education: Prayer for the family, Sunday-schools, and all educational institutions, for Young Men's Christian Associations, and for the Press.

FRIDAY, 7.—Prayer for the prevalence of justice, humanity, and peace among all nations; for the suppression of intemperance and Sabbath desecration.

SATURDAY, 8.—Prayer for Christian missions and the conversion of the world to Christ.

SUNDAY, 9.—Theme: On the Ministration of the Holy Spirit.

The Meetings of the Temperance Congress in the hall of Cooper Union last week were attended by large and enthusiastic audiences. Dr. L. D. Bevan, who presided on Thursday evening, proclaimed himself a convert to prohibition. He said that although in England he belonged to the party of moral suasion, he believed the evils of intemperance to be so widespread that a last appeal must be made to the power of the State. Next week we hope to publish the portraits of Mr. and Mrs. Eli Johnson, to whose exertions the success of the Temperance Congress is largely due.

The Sermons by Rev. Dr Talmage and Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, published this week in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, deserve especial notice. That by Dr. Talmage was delivered last Thanksgiving Day and is published now because Dr. Talmage did not preach at the Tabernacle last Lord's day. In it the preacher contrasts the present condition of the nation with its state on former Thanksgiving days, and points out how great cause we have for thankfulness to God for our national blessings. His graphic personal reminiscences will be read with interest and amusement. Mr. Spurgeon's sermon, of which the title does not convey an accurate conception, is commended to the perusal of any Christian reader who may be in doubt or in trouble. Its forcible arguments and apt illustratons cannot be read without a consoling and inspiriting effect.

Bible and Prayer Union. The lessons for the ensuing week are the consecutive Psalms; that for to-morrow, Dec. 17, being Psalm 137. The following requests for prayer have been received: For a poor consumptive in the last stages of his disease, and who is unprepared for death—For God's blessing on united efforts now being made at Tower City, Pa., for the rescue of souls—From a subscriber who has long suffered from painful illness, that his faith may be so increased that he may trust the Lord only, for recovery, and that he may have health and strength to work in the cause of Christ—Also that two brothers may turn to Christ and be saved—For a church in Virginia now in a state of great spiritual torpor that both pastor and people may be quickened—For two Christian sisters, one of whom is heavily afflicted, that they may receive more grace—From a subscriber anxious to resume work in the mission field, who has been laid aside by disease of the lungs that, if God will, he may be healed, and blessed in his work.

Chang, the Chinese Giant, Who Has Been well known in Europe for years past, arrived in New York by the steamer City of Berlin on December 1st. His height has never been measured, as the Chinese have a superstition about being measured before they are dead and laid out for burial, but it s known to be about nine feet. A reporter of a daily paper, whose height is 6 feet 3 inches, called upon him and stood under his outstretched arm, but did not reach within two inches of it, although he had a high silk hat on. On board the steamer wo staterooms had to be made into one for his accommodation, and a berth eleven feet long specially built for him. He wears a watch chain nine feet ong round his massive neck and bulky shoulders. The presence of such a man should give people an dea of the armed warrior Goliath, whose height was "six cubits and a span," or nine feet and six r eight inches.

A Christian Lady Living near Raymond, Pa., described by one of our subscribers as an affectionate wife and mother, patient and hardworking, was very suddenly called away from this world n Thanksgiving Day. At nine o'clock on the revious evening she was knitting by herself, aparently in her usual health, her husband absent his work and her three children in bed. Then e was suddenly seized with a fit, which was reeated fifteen times during the night, and she died bout eight in the morning. The most painful oss in her life was said to be the rebellious disoedience of some of her children. Unless they are ast feeling altogether, those children must be painlly affected at thus losing their mother without a ance to ask her forgiveness and be reconciled her.

Lending a Pie to the Lord.—"Mother," said ohnny, "haven't you a pie that you would e to lend to the Lord?" "Why, Johnny, at do you mean?" she asked; for she ought at first it was a joke. "Don't you remember," said he, "that the Bible says, 'He at hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the ord?' (Prov. 19 : 17) I don't believe old tsy has had a pie for a long time, and I ought perhaps you would like to have me take e over to her; then you would be lending to e Lord, you know."

One of mother's best pies went to old Betsy, owing to the boy's practical view of an old t.

"Jack, will You Show Me the Line when cross it?" asked a boy who was on a voyage h his father to South America, and who ought it would be a fine thing to see the equaial line. "Oh, yes, my boy," answered the lor to whom he put the question. After a days the boy asked whether they had crossed line. The old tar said, "Yes, my lad." Why didn't you tell me and show it to me?" e sailor replied, "Oh, we always cross the line the dark." This absurd answer would not absurd if applied to the man who drinks a ss of spirit occasionally, and thinks he can e up the practice whenever he likes. Some he may unconsciously cross the line where -restraint becomes impossible.

A Fortune has Resulted from a Misfortune in Colorado. Albert Bristol, one of the wealthiest men in that State, recently related the circumstances which ultimately led to his acquiring his immense property. He is a native of Vermont, but he went to the Far West in the hope of improving his prospects. He was disappointed in his first efforts, and was wandering, weary and dispirited, on the plains near Fort Collins, when he was overtaken by one of the deadly north-eastern tornadoes, and in his imminent peril he sought shelter in a cattle-shed. There the proprietor found him, some hours afterward, nearly frozen to death. He was a generous man, and succored the poor wanderer and nursed him back to life. On his recovery Mr. Bristol entered the service of his preserver, and acted with so much fidelity and discretion that he was taken into partnership, and now owns more than ten thousand sheep, besides land. The condition of the wanderer when found in the cattle-shed was not more desperate than the spiritual state of some men who are now rejoicing in everlasting riches they have secured through Him who came to seek and to save that which was lost.

Mr. Moody's Work in San Francisco Commenced with an address in the First Congregational Church. "We have met," he said, "to pray, and consequently I shall not make a long address this evening; but I want to say that if all the Christian people who are here to-night will just, at the commencement of these meetings, adopt one rule, and carry it out all through these services, you will not be disappointed, I think, at the end. Let that rule be this: That you keep your heart open to receive all the good things that God wants to give you, and that you won't lock up the door of your heart and bolt it with prejudice, or scepticism."

The Semi-Millennial Celebration of the Translation of the Bible into the English language, held in New York on December 2d, was attended by a numerous body of distinguished men. Clergymen, statesmen, judges, and presidents of colleges united in doing honor to the noble reformer whom God raised up five hundred years ago to do the great work. Dr. Storrs in describing Wycliffe's work compared it to the building of the cathedral of Cologne, which has recently been completed, six centuries after its commencement. Dr. Storrs said: "I think the work we celebrate the nobler of the two. To us at least the voice of God becomes articulate through the Book; while the building only shows us the magnificent achievement of human genius, patience, and wealth, bringing to Him their unsurpassed tribute."

A Child's Gospel Message to her Sick Uncle was described at a recent meeting of the Norfolk County, Mass., Sunday-school Union. The child was only six years old. Her uncle was sick unto death. The little girl crept up to his bedside, put one little hand on the cheek of the sick man, and reaching up pressed her face to his and whispered, "Cast your sins on Jesus, the Spotless Lamb of God." He burst into tears. The little girl went about her play, not telling any one that she had been in the room. His mental anguish was as great as his bodily suffering. All through the night he lay praying for mercy and forgiveness. The next day the little messenger again went to the sick man, and whispered, with winning tenderness, "Did you do as I told you, Uncle William?" "Yes, I did, I did! He has washed away my sins."

Among the Instances of Immorality which the depraved Mormon system encourages is one that occurred only a few weeks ago. A man in Nevada holding a fair position in society lost his wife by death. The widower, after a short interval, conceived a wicked passion for the four sisters of his deceased wife. He took them all to Salt Lake and married them. Thus the laws of God as well as those of the United States are openly defied in the modern Sodom.

THE BELIEVER CATECHISED.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon

"Believest thou this?"—John 11 : 26.

A Key for all God's Locks—Often Unemployed—Through Ignorance—Through want of Appreciation—The Saviour's Searching Question: "Believest thou this?"—I. This Particular Doctrine?—A General Faith Defective—Unused Faith like a Sluggard's Farm—Stages of Martha's Faith—II. This Distinct Doctrine?—A Collier's Comprehensive Faith—A Faith fit for Idiots—Definite Faith Necessary for Comfort—III. This Difficult Truth?—An Old Woman's Capacity of Faith—IV. This Truth Connected with Jesus?—V This Truth Applicable to Personal and Presents Needs—VI. This Practical Truth?—Bed-ridden Truths—Answers to Prayer not Wonderful.

THE Saviour said to Martha, "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die. Believest thou this?"

When believers are sorrowful they may be assured that a consolation is provided exactly adapted to their cases. For every lock that God has made He has provided a key. As every blade of grass has its own drop, so every grief has its comfort. I doubt not that for every pain which racks this mortal frame there is an anodyne among the herbs of the field, and for every disease there is a remedy in God's wondrous laboratory if we could but find it. As for us who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, we may rest assured that if we are borne down by excessive sorrow it is almost always our own fault, and arises from a defect in our faith; for if our faith were as strong as it ought to be we should "take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, and in distresses, for Christ's sake"; we should find that as our tribulations abounded so would our consolations also abound by Christ Jesus.

It will be well, therefore, when we are greatly distressed, not so much to look to the apparent cause of the present trouble as at the condition of our own hearts; it will be wise to inquire wherein our faith is wanting, and what it may be which prevents our laying hold upon the comfort provided for the present distress. It frequently happens that our faith is defective because of slender knowledge. A man cannot believe what he does not know. My dear, tried friend, there is a promise in the Scriptures which would exactly meet your case, and if grasped by faith it would immediately cheer you, and you know nothing of its efficacy because you may never yet have read it, or, having read it, you may never have paused over it and considered its meaning, and so you are needlessly distressed; for your relief lies close at hand, and is easy of application.

It may be that as yet you have not learned the whole

and this also deprives you of comfort. You have laid hold upon the vital and saving part of revelation, but the strengthening and exhilarating part of it you know not. You have fed on the necessary bread of Christ's house, but not upon the luscious fruits of His garden.

Faith may be defective through ignorance, and it may also be defective through a want of appreciation of the person of Christ. It was so in Martha's case; she did not know enough about her Lord to perceive His power to meet her sorrow. The apostle Paul says, in the passage which I just now quoted, "Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ," as if the knowledge of Jesus were indeed the most important knowledge which a believer can obtain, and so it is. If we are but half instructed as to our Lord we shall be but half comforted.

It is not to be supposed that every true believer in Christ is assuredly a perfect believer. Martha truly believed in Jesus, but she did not perfectly believe in Him. I do not know how many here have, or think they have, perfect faith; such good people will get very little from the discourse of this morning; but then, happily, they do not need it. Those of us who have an imperfect faith—and I suspect that this would describe most of us—may gather instruction from the Saviour's question to Martha: "Believest thou this?" May the Holy Spirit cause it to be so.

I. Our first head will be:

particular doctrine? I will not just now suggest any one doctrine above another, but merely advise your putting the question about every revealed truth. You, who are believers, have faith in the Scriptures in general; you can boldly declare that from the first word of Genesis to the last word of the Revelation, you believe all that is written in the inspired volume. Now the point is to take out of this general mass of things believed, or supposed to be believed, each one separate item, and look it over in detail, and then say with your heart and conscience, "I believe this."

It is easy to talk in the gross, and it is very easy to think that we have a vast amount of faith, and yet we may have little or none worth having. We may fancy that we embrace within our arms the whole of revealed truth, and yet when we come to a quiet examination of our soul we may find that much is slipping away from us by a process of questioning and doubt which we hardly dare acknowledge. Things believed and never used are like a sluggard's farm which lies fallow, and is never tilled; we hardly call such ground a farm, and can we call such belief real faith? Why, some truths taught in the Word are not even known by numbers of professors, and we cannot believe what we do not know. If we do not see the surface meaning, which is within our reach, we cannot be said to believe in any real sense.

Martha, when our Saviour questioned her, had already expressed her faith in certain great truths. She said, "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died"; she believed in the Saviour's power to heal the sick. She believed that so long as her brother yet breathed, the power of Christ could have kept him alive; for she was convinced that Jesus was master of disease, and could restore the suffering to health. This was something worthy of her faith, but it was not enough. Our Lord set a further fact before her, and asked, "Believest thou this?" It is for us to grow in knowledge, and to exercise faith in proportion as we do so.

Next, Martha believed that though her brother was dead, such was the efficacy of Christ's prayer that He could do something, she does not quite say what, to comfort the bereaved—"I know, that even now, whatsoever Thou wilt ask of God, God will give it Thee." She had faith in our Lord's prevalence with God in prayer, and that to an unlimited degree. She believed in Jesus as a mighty intercessor, one who had but to speak with the Most High and His request would surely be answered; this is a very commendable measure of faith; I wish that we all had as much. So much faith was something admirable, but it was not enough for her present comfort, and therefore Jesus puts before her a fact even more honorable to Himself, and then adds, "Believest thou this?"

I would to God, dear friends, that all of us who call ourselves Christians would every now and then go over the Bible, and rehearse the great doctrines in order before our minds; stopping over each one of them, and saying to your heart and mind, "Believest thou this?" Take, for instance, that great and earliest of doctrines, the election of grace, "Whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son." Pause over this and other similar texts, and consider their evident meaning, and then say to your own hearts, "Believest thou this?"

Some believers in Christ do not attempt to accept this doctrine, but even call it horrible, and others speak of it as so mysterious and unpractical that it is not to be preached in public. I would invite such honestly to look the doctrine in the face, and see whether they do believe it or no; for if they do not, they may as well take a pen and cross out of the Word of God all passages which plainly teach it. They would not like to do this, and yet they do that which amounts to the same thing. When a man is afraid of a doctrine, or ashamed of it, he has grave cause to suspect that he does not believe it.

Take another grand truth: "A man is justified by faith, and not by the works of the law." "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." "He that believeth in Him is not condemned." The perfect pardon of the believer, the complete justifying power of the righteousness of Christ to them that believe, is plainly taught in the Bible—"Believest thou this?" If thou dost, why dost thou go every day and perpetually call thyself a "miserable sinner," when thou art so no longer, but a blood-washed saint, and a happy child of God?

It may be that brethren will say of a certain truth that this is a high doctrine, or a mysterious doctrine, which seems almost too good to be true; but all this is wide of the mark. The one question is—Is it revealed? "King Agrippa," said Paul, "Believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest." So would I say to each one of you—If you believe the prophets and the apostles, why do you not believe one by one those great truths which God has spoken by them? And if you believe them to be revealed, how dare you cast a slur upon them, as being this, that, and the other?

How this inquiry, well managed and pressed home, will enlarge the range of faith! How will it strengthen its grasp and hand-hold! How rich would our souls become! Search the Scriptures and take the teaching of the Word of God in detail, line by line, and word by word, and say to your soul, "Believest thou this?" Ask for an anointing from the Holy One that you may know all things and understand with all saints what are the heights and depths, and know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge. There will be profit connected with this our first point if each one will conscientiously catechise his mind and say, "Believest thou this particular doctrine of the Word?"

II. Our next division shall be briefly handled. Believest thou

THIS DISTINCT DOCTRINE?

I find, and especially among members of certain churches, great cloudiness as to their faith. I would not judge severely, but I notice that those converted persons who come to us from certain quarters, which I will not now name, believe the gospel, but it is too much after the manner of the collier in the old story. When he was asked, "What do you believe?" He answered, "I believe as the Church believes." He was then questioned, "But what does the Church believe?" He replied, "The Church believes what I believe." Being further asked, "And what do you and the Church believe?" he answered, "We both believe the same thing." There was no getting further with him. Is not this kind of faith common enough at this day? Many who are called Christians have this blind faith and little more.

This doting faith in you know not what is fitter for idiots than rational beings. Let those delight in it who are of slavish mind, or too idle to think for themselves; as for us, so long as we have eyes we shall not yield to walk blindfolded. We like a man to do his own thinking. Put your garments out to wash, if you please; but your thinking you should do at home. There is no reaching the land of truth unless you will work your passage by thinking over the teaching of the Lord. What I tell you, you may believe or not at your pleasure; but I beseech you do not accept it for any other reason than that in your own judgment it is in accordance with the mind of God as unveiled in holy Writ. The Church of Rome says, "Yield an implicit faith to the church"—this is a fine platform for priestcraft, and you see through the scheme in a minute; but we say the very reverse, and charge you not to believe a single word that any one of us, or all of us put together shall say to you if it be contrary to the Word of God.

Our Saviour puts a certain truth before Martha in distinct terms; He left the general haze of the resurrection in which she believed, and said, "I who stand before you am the resurrection and the life. Believest thou this?" Do you believe the doctrine put in this clear form and shape? He gave her crisp, sharp, definite teaching, and said, "Believest thou this?" He brought before her mental vision, not an impalpable, shadowy image and spectre of truth, but a solid, substantial statement that He Himself was the resurrection and the life, raising those who believe in Him from the dead, and keeping in life those who, being alive, believe in Him; and then He demanded: "Believest thou this?"

A great many persons see doctrines in a kind of dim, hazy light, and in that they exercise a sort of faith, but they will never get comfort out of truth in that fashion. We must believe revealed truth as we see it, in its own clear, well defined, and accurate form as Scripture shows it. For instance, the doctrine of the atonement is robbed of half its delight if indistinctly stated. Thousands of Christians believe in a kind of atonement, a means of reconciliation, a sort of propitiation made by Christ, which in some way or other brings us to God; but, beloved, I would have you believe that "He His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree." "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." Believest thou this?

Read the 53d of Isaiah, in which you have substitution set forth most clearly. Yes, read the chapter through and pause over such a verse as the eleventh, "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied; by His knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for He shall bear their iniquities." And then put it to yourself: "Believest thou this? The very life and soul and sweetness of atonement will be found in the substitution of the innocent Saviour for the guilty sinner in the actual bearing of the penalty of sin, the real payment of the debt; for then I know that I am clear, because He, in my stead, has vindicated justice, honored the law, and glorified God. Believest thou this? Have a quick and true answer to the question "Believest thou this distinct and clear truth?" Answer, "Yea, Lord."

III. We will now go a little further, in the third place, to ask, "Believest thou

THIS DIFFICULT TRUTH?"

Certain truths are hard to grasp. There are points about them which almost stagger faith till faith rises to her true character, and is no longer dwarfed into carnal reasoning; but these difficult things are to be believed. It was not easy for Martha to understand how the Lord Jesus could himself be the resurrection and the life, and yet her brother was dead. It was not an easy truth for her to believe, for it is not easy for us.

But, my brethren, when we become Christians we cease to consider difficulties of belief, for we take the Scriptures upon divine authority and submit ourselves implicity to their teaching. At any rate, I have done so. What the Church is to the Romanists, that the Bible and the Holy Spirit are to me. This done, no difficulty remains one half so great as those which I have surmounted. I believed, first of all, that God was in Christ, that He who made the heavens and the earth came down below and took upon Himself human nature, was born at Bethlehem, was cradled in a manger, and did suck His nourishment from a woman's breast: after having believed that I can believe anything. An incarnate God once accepted, no difficulty need stagger my faith.

Martha's speech—"I believe that thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world"—proved her readiness to believe all else that Jesus might teach. The incarnation, to begin with, without believing which a man can be no Christian at all, is so profound a mystery that other teachings are simple in its presence. "Without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh." Once rejoice in the light of this which is the very day-star of hope to us, that God has taken into union with Himself our human nature, and you are ready for all light.

Only let me know that God says anything is true, that is enough for me. I do not quite join with the poor old woman in her words, but I agree with her spirit, who put her implicit faith in Scripture in the most unguarded way. When some one ridiculed her for believing that the whale swallowed Jonah, "Dear," said she, "if the Word of God had said that Jonah swallowed the whale I should have believed it." Brethren, prostrate yourselves before the utterance of God. Not before man's dictum or dogma, not before the utterance of priest, presbyter, pastor, or philosopher, but before God, who cannot err, we prostrate our souls.

Believest thou this, then? This difficult truth? I put this very earnestly to some of you, because it may be that at this moment you are in trouble from want of faith in a promise or a doctrine which seems hard to you. You have a promise, "When thou passest through the fire thou shalt not be burned, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee." Believest thou this, though all things appear to be consumed in the heat of thy affliction? It may be that you are under a peculiar cloud and dense gloom, and yet Jesus declares, "I am the light of the world, he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life"; and, again, "Whosoever believeth Me shall not abide in darkness." Believest thou this?

Canst thou laugh at impossibility, and say it shall be done, for God hath said it? Knowest thou not that things impossible with men are possible with God? Can thy faith leap over the head of carnal reason? Can present circumstances and the deductions of thine own judgment all be waved aside by the left hand as thou sayest, "Let God be true and every man a liar?" If so, thou hast the faith which will comfort and bless thee, but if not, like Martha, thou wilt be bowed down with sorrow, since thou hast not yet believed the truth which can cheer thee.

IV. Fourthly, to pass on: "Believest thou this?" that is, Believest thou

THIS TRUTH AS IT STANDS CONNECTED WITH JESUS?

I called your attention just now to the fact that Martha believed that there would be a resurrection. "Ay," saith Christ, "but I am the resurrection; believest thou this?" Now it is one thing to believe doctrine, but it is another thing to believe that doctrine as it is embodied in the person of Jesus Christ. "Believest thou this?" There the comfort lies: in believing the truth as you find it in Him who is the truth.

Martha was called upon to believe first in Christ's personal power. "The dead will rise." "True, Martha; but dost thou believe that I shall make them rise, that it is through Me the dead shall live? Yea, that I am the life and resurrection. Dost thou believe that?" She was to believe, moreover, in His present power. Mark that. "Even now," said Jesus, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that liveth and believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in Me, shall never die." It is one thing to believe that Jesus will have power, at the last day, to raise the dead; but do we believe that He is even now the resurrection and the life?

Moreover, she was called on to believe in the nion of Christ with His people; that they are so ne with Him, that they are partakers of His life, hat if they should come under the power of death hey should be delivered out of it; and that being ut of the power of death they shall never come nder it: in Christ the dead shall live, the living hall not die. "Oh," saith one, "but I myself o not comprehend this, for I see good people ie." Yes, you see what you think is death; but hey do not truly die, they rise into a higher life. hat which is the essence of death never touches elievers—they "depart out of the world unto the ather"; they go "to be with Christ, which is far etter," but they do not die. Believest thou this? Come now, let us each say, do I really believe at Christ Jesus has all power in heaven and in rth? Do I worship Him as God over all, blessed rever? Able to do exceeding abundantly above l that I ask or even think? And when I come in ayer before God do I so believe in Christ that I member His promise, "Whatsoever ye shall ask e Father in My name I will give it you"; not e Father, but I. Even Christ himself will give u all things. Have you such a notion and idea your Lord that you know that He can do all ings for you now, and that in answer to your ayer He can grant you any blessing and save you t of any trouble and every trouble: believest ou this?

V. We must now pass on to a fifth head. Believest thou this?—that is to say, Believest thou

THIS TRUTH WHICH IS APPLICABLE TO THYSELF NOW?

That was the point with Martha, and this was the place wherein she fell short. She believed that all would rise. But Jesus virtually says—"Believest thou that I am the resurrection and the life, because if it be so, I am able to raise thy brother at once. Believest thou this?" Now, observe, that we sometimes receive great truths and yet we are staggered by lesser truths, because, it may be, the great truth has no practical bearing upon us just now, while the present truth, though it be somewhat less in other respects, has a greater practical bearing upon ourselves and our condition. We doubt the promise most necessary to our comfort.

For look, she believes that all will rise; well, then, it was a much smaller thing to believe that one would rise. She doubts whether Lazarus can rise because he is in the grave, yet she believes that millions upon millions will rise from the ground. Doubtless that was because of the distance of the time and the scene. Some such feeling must have operated on her mind, for the general resurrection is the greater difficulty.

I beg you to see whether you are not often walking in the same path. Yonder is a poor soul who believes that Jesus Christ can wash away all sin. Now, my dear friend, dost thou believe that He can wash thy sin away? That is the point, because all the sins of millions are much greater than thine can be, and if Jesus can take away the sin of so many, surely He can take away thine. Believest thou this? Wilt thou come and trust Him for thyself? And thou, Christian, thou believest in general that all things work together for good to those who love God; dost thou believe that all thy ills, little and great, are working good for thee? Will of thine work for thy good? Dost thou believe that yesterday's bad debt will work for good? Dost thou believe that the death of thy child will work for good? You know it must be easier to believe that the events of one day will work for good than to believe that all things in the world throughout life will do so; and yet it may be you are staggered at your present trials, and you confess your misgivings.

Have you faith in everything but that which would comfort you? Have you everything but the special requirement of the hour? How odd! How sad! The carpenter needs to drive a nail, and he has all his tools with him except his hammer! What is he to do? What is the good of all his other tools? If you can believe everything except the truth which would cheer you at this present moment, you are depriving yourself of comfort and strength. Believest thou this present promise, given for this very day? The Lord hath said "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." Believest thou this? "Underneath are the everlasting arms." Believest thou this?

VI. The last point shall be this: Believest thou

THIS PRACTICAL TRUTH?

Martha said that she believed it; but her after acts did not prove it. She comprehended the belief in the Lord's Word in her declaration, "Yea, Lord, I believe that Thou art the Christ, the Son of God, which should come into the world." But yet she did not believe so as to act on the belief. Coleridge says, "Truths, of all others, the most awful and mysterious, and at the same time of universal interest, are too often considered as so true, that they lose all the power of truth, and lie bedridden in the dormitory of the soul, side by side with the most despised and exploded errors."

How true is the remark, Do you not know people who are better than their creed? Why is that? Why, for the very same reason that many people are worse than their creed, because their creed is asleep, and is not operating upon them: they believe as though they did not believe. This is a poor imitation of faith. There is at this moment a house on fire in London. I will suppose that I know the fact, and tell you of it, and you believe it. But what do you care? Not one of you stirs. Ay, but if you saw the engine hurrying along the street and believed that your own house was blazing, I warrant you you would bestir yourselves. Your belief would come a little more home to you as your own concern. So there are certain truths which do not seem to concern us to any high degree, at least for the present. They are true and important, but they operate no more upon us than if they were fictions.

Martha says she believes in Jesus as the resurrection and the life; yet what is her action? Christ commands the bystanders to take away the stone from the sepulchre, and she interposes with her cry, "Lord, by this time he stinketh!" She fears the obnoxious consequences of uncovering such a mass of corruption, though He who is the resurrection and the life stands at the grave's mouth. Ah! Martha, where is thy faith in Him? Dear heart, she says that she believes in Jesus as the resurrection and the life, and yet she is afraid that her brother will not rise though the Mighty One stands there to raise him. Is she not just like you and me? We believe that God hears prayer, and therefore we pray; but if the Lord desires to surprise us He has only to answer our requests.

I have seen God's children running with vast astonishment to tell their friends, "Here is a wonderful thing! Oh, such has happened to me! I offered a prayer and God has heard me." An amazing thing that God should do as He said He would! They put these things in books as marvels, and call the volume, "Remarkable Answers to Prayer." Dear me, is it remarkable that it is cold when it freezes? Do we speak of the remarkable warmth of the sun's beams at midsummer? Is it remarkable that the fires in our houses should warm us when we put our hands to them? Is he a remarkable God because He says He will hear prayer and does it? An answer to prayer should be remembered with gratitude, and yet it should be regarded as the most natural thing in all the world that our heavenly Father should fulfil His promises to His children. It is a great wonder that God should promise, but not a wonder that He should perform. It is marvellous that God should promise to hear prayer, but no wonder at all that when He has promised to do so He is as good as His word.

Brethren, we are to a great degree unpractical in other respects also, and we may take up many and many a truth that we do not act upon and say to our heart, "Believest thou this?" Might I not step outside the door this morning, and putting my hand upon a fainting believer as he left the house say, "Believest thou thy God?" Thou sayest, "I am so faint in spirit that I shall utterly fall and perish at the last." But the Lord hath said, "He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength." Believest thou this? I might go to another who is sighing and crying because of his poverty, and say to him "God hath said, 'No good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly.' Believest thou this?" What would the complainer say?

My brethren, let us, then, go over these matters with our souls. We call ourselves believers, but are we believers at all? If it be so that one after another we doubt the precious things of God when they come before us in detail, where is our faith? Let us entreat our God to grant us grace that we may put our finger on this doctrine, on that promise, and on the other assurance, and say of each one, "Lord, I believe this, and I believe this, and I believe this: for I believe whatsoever thou sayest in Thy Word, and I know that it shall be even as thou hast told me." God bless you, beloved, and be ever with you, for Christ's sake. Amen.

[Portion of Scripture read Before the Sermon
John 11 : 1-46].

By a London Clergyman.

UNCLE ROBERT'S HAMPER.

CHAPTER I.

It was Christmas eve. The air was so frosty and keen that the good folks of Beveril might well move quickly. It was no time to stand still, when the thermometer was at freezing point. And considering that everybody felt alike the imperative need of rapid motion, that there was a large number of people abroad, and that the horses, of which there was a goodly number too, held precisely the same views as their masters (to judge by their movements), a scene of considerable life was presented to the eye at this particular time and place. Packages and hampers of all shapes and sizes were lying about; messengers, little and big, were laden to the utmost of their physical capacity; and carts and carriages rolled about in all directions.

As we are concerned with the fate of but one hamper out of the great multitude, we will dismiss all the others once and forever, and keeping our eye upon this, follow it to its destination. It was one of those exceedingly interesting hampers whose contents are generally as acceptable as they are mysterious. When it is set down at the door, and we catch sight of the straw packing, as it is just ever so slightly presented to our view, we feel a wonderful little throb of happy expectation, and are quite confident we shall find it worth the opening.

As to the contents of this particular hamper, we must stifle our curiosity until it is opened in a proper and lawful manner by the person to whom it is addressed:

"JAMES GREX, Esq.,
"Aston House,
"Beveril.
"This side up. With Care."

Up drives the railway cart to the above-named house. Down jumps the driver; and in a very few minutes the hamper is laid down in the hall, and opened. How the little Grexes did stare, to be sure! How the bigger Grexes tried to look indifferent, and failed! How the biggest Grexes of all held up to the delighted view of the curious circle each article as it was taken out, until there was nothing left!

"Nothing," did I say? so the eldest Grexes thought and said. But one small, sharp boy, with a talent for discovery, managed, by much groping and at the cost of many pricks, to pull out of its hiding-place a bottle. It was a black bottle, very cobwebby and dirty. It seemed for all the world like a castaway bottle, which had been lying in some out-of-the way corner for a very long time, and had been picked out again to help to fill up the hamper and keep the things from shaking against each other. The little Grexes were disgusted beyond measure with it at first. But their feelings veered quite round when they heard their father say,

"Why, if Uncle Robert hasn't sent us a bottle of his old port! How good of him! It's worth I don't know how many pounds a bottle."

The dirty black bottle became from that moment the most interesting and delightful of all the hamper's contents.

Christmas day soon came. There were a good many empty pews in the parish church that day; but the Grex's pew was full from one end to the other. And a very earnest sermon did they hear about the Lord Jesus and His great love; and how God's own Son took the form of a little baby, and was born in a stable because there was no room for Him in the inn; and how the shepherds heard the song of the angels when they were watching in their fields by night, and what the song was.

I feel bound, however, to state, that when the younger Grexes were asked to give an account of the sermon, or at least to repeat the text, they failed most miserably, and were obliged to confess that their thoughts were hovering over the good things coming, and especially over a certain black bottle and its contents.

How the Christmas dinner passed off, and how the sharp appetites, young and old, did ample justice to the liberal spread, and how at last the youngest Grexes were obliged to give in, I have not space to tell. Let us rather leap on to the arrival of the eagerly looked-for treat of the old port which Uncle Robert had sent. At the proper time the black bottle was produced, and the glasses were well filled. Mr. Grex held up his glass to the light, and remarked approvingly on its mellowness and richness of color, and the effect of time on good wines.

And then, in order to give moral elevation to the young minds surrounding him, remarked that good people grew mellow too with time, and expressed his most earnest desire that they all would find it so in their own experience. And then, as a special favor, and because it was Christmas time, or to point his moral the better, or, perhaps, because his heart was benevolently disposed, he poured out another glass for each.

They had just come to the bottom of the black bottle when there came a sound of voices from the street—the voices of men singing. They were singing "Hark! the herald angels sing." They were not singing it well. They were not singing in tune. And when one of the little Grexes looked out of the window she brought back the report that one of the men did not seem to be singing at all, and that he was leaning against the gate as though he were ill, and that two or three of the others looked as if they ought to lean against the gate too, for they could only stand upright with a great effort. She expressed her wonder at it, and her sympathy as well, and wished she had kept her last glass of the old port wine for them.

Mr. Grex, somewhat surprised at her statement, came also to the window. He soon turned away. It was with such a sad, shocked face that he returned, that Mrs. Grex asked him the reason of it. He told her that nearly all the singers were the worse for drink, and that the one leaning against the gate had the top of a black bottle sticking out of his pocket. Ringing the bell he told the servant to order the men to move off, which, after some grumbling and a demand for drink, they did.

Now it was the custom of the Grexes on Christmas day to send to some of the poor near them a supply of good things from their own table. And as the gifts were more appreciated when brought by the master of the house, he was in the habit of going himself, where it was possible. So, ordering a basket to be made up, and assuring the family circle of his speedy return, he departed on his charitable errand.

An hour and a half passed away before he returned; and this was so long a time that Mrs. Grex began to feel uneasy. She looked at her watch again and again, and was constantly going to the window, or sending one of the children, to see if their father were coming. She was afraid that something might have happened to him. At last his well-known step was heard, and soon he was with them again.

If he looked sad when he returned from the sight of the drunken choristers, he looked sadder than ever now. An expression of extreme pain was stamped upon his face. He went silently to his place in the corner and sat down, and for a few minutes looked intently at the fire. For a lively, cheery man like Mr. Grex there was something very extraordinary in this behavior. No one, however, asked him why he looked so, though all were wondering. Mrs. Grex began very wisely to talk on another subject altogether.

At last he turned to the subject himself. He began in a strange and almost a startling way. Rising up, and going to the table, he grasped the empty black bottle, and deliberately laid it down on the hearth-rug in the midst of the whole circle. Having done which, and returned to his seat, he said, looking around upon them all,

"You have all noticed my sadness and depression. I feel more even than my looks show. And now I want to tell you why. You know I've just been to old Widow Suggins. She lives at the top of the house, and as no one came to the front door when I knocked, I was obliged to go up to her. There were three families in the house besides the widow herself. I had to pass all their doors on the way up. As they were partly open, I was able to look in, and see how they were spending their Christmas.

"The first room I came to was that of an old man and his older wife. Indeed, they were both so old that they seemed to be on the very margin of the grave. Surprised to hear no voices within, I looked more intently, and at last went in.

"What I witnessed I hope I shall never see again. They lay both of them on the floor before their extinguished fire. They were silent, I found, because they were both stupefied with drink. There they lay, moving neither hand nor foot. As I looked upon their white hair and shrivelled faces, my blood grew cold in my veins, for I thought of the very few days which remained for them on earth, and of the awful way in which they were spending them. I thought, if no drunkard can enter into the kingdom of heaven, what must be the awful fate of this hoary old couple!

"There was a black bottle on the table, not unlike this one at our feet. I took it up, and found it, as I expected, drained to the very dregs. Some one, apparently, had made them a present of it, thinking to cheer their old hearts, and help them to spend a merry Christmas. They had consumed it in honor of the giver, and stupefied themselves with drinking his health. I lifted them both up, placed them on their bed, and then left them. Who would not be saddened at such a sight as that?

"The next room I came to presented a very different view to my eyes. There was as happy a family circle as ours. A capital fire was burning in the grate, and on the top of all was a great log, which crackled and blazed away most cheeriily. The faces around it literally shone with happiness. On the table there were but few Christmas delicacies—a few oranges and nuts—but they were as much pleased as we were just now, and seemed to enjoy their fare quite as much.

"I was attracted to the room by the sound of singing. And I found, when I was near enough to catch the words, that they were singing a hymn together. It was the very same one that the drunken men tried to sing just now outside our gates. They made sweeter music by far. One omission, for the first time in my life, I was glad to see. There was no bottle on the table, black or white. At the conclusion of their hymn I took the liberty of knocking, and their welcome was both prompt and hearty. The husband told me that they were all teetotalers, and took no strong drink of any sort. Last Christmas, he said, however, was spent in a very different way. His wife was appealed to in proof of this, and even the children looked assent. She said:

"'My husband was out all Christmas day last year, rambling from one public house to the other, and I was going after him trying to get him home and keep him out of mischief. We had no fire in the grate then, and not a single scrap of anything on the table to eat. All the money was spent on drink. And it was the same for a good many Christmas days before that too. It was about nine months ago that he signed the pledge, and since then he hasn't touched a drop of strong drink. We have never spent such a happy Christmas day since we were married.'

"Then said the husband, 'I don't care for the public house a bit now. I'd rather stay here and sing hymns with my wife and little 'uns, about the blessed Lord who died for our sins, and made Himself poor that we might be rich. Ah! to think of the Lord loving a poor drunkard of the likes of me, and putting it into my heart to give up the drink, and giving me the strength to do it; and then leading me on further still to the cross, and teaching me that my sin was all nailed and put away there.

"'I believe, sir,' he added, striking his great hand down upon the table, 'that the blessed Lord died for me, and for my wife, and for my children, and I do trust in His merits with all this 'ere heart of mine. And so do my wife, too, thank God. And we're trying to teach the little 'uns to trust the Lord Jesus too.'

"I told him how glad I was that they were spending such a happy Christmas day, and kneeling down with them, I offered up a prayer to Him who had done it all. Then shaking them all by the hand I left them.

THE MENACING COMET AND THE BURNING OF THE EARTH.

By Mr. R. A. Proctor, the Astronomer.

The Comet Visible in Australia—Possibility of Collision with the Sun—Consequent Increase of Solar Heat—Identifying the Comet—A London Astronomer's Opinion—Sir Isaac Newton's Theory—The Meteoric Mass of a Comet—The Ultimate Collision Certain—Changes in Another Stellar System—The Sun might Afterward Resume its Ordinary Influences.

THE menacing comet is the one recently visible, in 1880, in the Australian heavens, and which is one of the most interesting comets ever seen by man. Views respecting it, not by fanciful theorizers, but by mathematicians of eminence by no means prone to adopt wild and startling ideas, suggest the possibility—nay even some degree of probability that this comet may bring danger to the solar system. Like the comet of 1843, it passed within about one hundred and ninety thousand miles from the solar surface, and on a path very similar to that pursued by the comet of 1843 while in the neighborhood of the sun. The comet of 1880 is, in fact, identical with that of 1843, but its period is diminishing rapidly, so that at an early date it may fall into the sun, with this alarming immediate result—that all the higher forms of life at least will be destroyed off the surface of the earth.

The idea that the comet of 1880 may be identical not only with that of 1843, but with that of 1668, the period having been reduced from 175 years to 37, was suggested at the Astronomical Society last April by Mr. Marth, a mathematician of great skill, and well known for the zeal with which he attacks problems relating to the movements of the satellites of Saturn and Mars. He says: "Supposing the comet of 1843 is the same as that of 1668, it would not be very wonderful that it should reappear after 37 years instead of 175 years. The velocity of a body moving in the solar system depends simply on its distance from the sun and on the period of revolution. If the velocity is reduced by a resisting medium, there will be a reduction of the period, and there is nothing whatever unreasonable in the supposition that, however weak the corona may be, its resistance would have a very great effect upon the motion of a comet which rushes through it; so that I should not be at all surprised if it should turn out that this comet of 1880 is the same as the comet of 1843 and that of 1668, and that its revolution has been so much affected that possibly it may return in, say 17 years."

Now if this theory of Mr. Marth regarding the comet of the present year be the true one, we are somewhat more nearly interested in the matter than we are in most theories respecting comets. If already the comet experiences such resistances in passing through the corona when at its nearest to the sun that its period undergoes a marked diminution, the effect must of necessity be increased at each return, and after only a few—possibly one or two—circuits, the comet will be absorbed by the sun.

It will be remembered that SIR ISAAC NEWTON recognized the possibility that this might happen o a comet having such an orbit as that of the comet of 1680 (generally known as Newton's comet), and that he considered the consequences might be full of danger to this earth. Yet he only welt on the danger arising, as he judged, from he addition of so much fuel to the solar fires. We know now that the real danger lies not from he absorption of so much matter as may exist in comet's head and nucleus, but from the conver-ion of the momentum of the swiftly rushing mass f the comet into heat, the thermal equivalent of s mechanical energy. Now, at present, assuming the period of the comet to be thirty-seven ears, the velocity of the nucleus when nearest o the sun must exceed 300 miles per second. As to the mass of the comet's head we can form no opinion. But we know that the relatively insignificant comet of 1866, called Temple's, which required a telescope to make it visible, is followed by millions of millions of meteoric masses, and that when our earth passes through this system of meteors, though they enter her atmosphere with a velocity of only about 39 miles per second, they are converted into glowing vapor in their passage through it.

If we consider how far more densely aggregated the meteoric masses must be which form the nucleus, head, and train (not tail, bien-entendu) of the comet of 1843, how much larger the individual meteors, and that the velocity at the time of their final absorption could not be less than ten times that with which the November meteors enter the earth's atmosphere, it will be evident that the danger of which Sir Isaac Newton spoke so impressively in his celebrated letter is by no means altogether fanciful. I have, for my own part, been long of opinion that the periodical increase of such stars as Mira (the Wonderful Star) in the Whale, and Eta of the ship Argo, is due to the motion of some large comet followed by a meteoric train about these two stars.

I have indicated fully, in my "Pleasant Ways in Science," the reasons which induced me to believe that the outburst of the so-called "new star" in the Northern Crown in 1866 is to be similarly explained. Without saying that I consider there is absolute danger of a similar outburst in the case of our own sun, when the comet of 1843 shall be absorbed by him (a result which will, in my opinion, most certainly take place), I will go so far as to express my belief that if ever the day is to come "when the heavens shall dissolve with fervent heat," the cause of the catastrophe will be the downfall of some great comet on the sun.

I believe the passage even of the head of a comet over the earth would do comparatively little harm, for if the shower of meteoric masses were very dense, the meteors themselves being of the larger sort, and so able to break their way through the earth's atmosphere, the shower might kill a few of the earth's inhabitants, or even many hundreds. But there would be no widespread destruction of life. But it would be altogether otherwise, I believe, if a comet of the larger sort fell into or were absorbed by the sun.

The danger would lie in the sun's own might, not in the comet or its attendant train. The bodies forming the head, nucleus, and train of the comet would fall in immense numbers with enormous velocity, and each with mighty momentum on the sun's fiery surface. Possibly and in my opinion, probably, their most destructive work would be accomplished below that surface, under the still more stupendous attractive energy of that smaller because more condensed orb within, which I take to be the true ruling centre of the solar system. It might well be that the effects thus produced would be but transient. In a few weeks, possibly in a few days or even hours, the sun, excited for a while to intense heat and splendor, would resume his usual temperature, his usual lustre.

Such, indeed, was the nature of the change which affected the so-called "new star" in the Northern Crown. For a day or two it shone out with several hundred times its usual lustre, and doubtless it poured forth during those few days several hundred times its usual heat. Then gradually its fires cooled, its lustre diminished, and, after a few weeks had passed, it shone as it had shone before for hundreds of years, with the lustre of a ninth magnitude star only.

But it is certain that, if there are planets circling around that remote sun, and if the ordinary light and heat of that orb sufficed for the requirements of the inhabitants of those orbs, the abnormal light and heat during the outburst in 1866 must have destroyed all living creatures from the face of each one of those worlds. It is equally certain that if at any time a great comet, falling directly upon the sun. should by the swift rush of its meteoric components, excite the flame of the sun to a lustre far exceeding that with which he at present shines, the sudden access of lustre and of heat would prove destructive to every living creature, or at any rate to all the higher forms of life upon this earth. And though in a few days the sun might resume his ordinary lustre, and no longer glow with abnormal heat, he wouldpour his rays on a family of worlds in which not one of the higher forms either of vegetable or animal life would remain in existence.

THE MOTHER'S DREAM.

By Mr. Thomas Cook, the English Excursion Manager.

I BEGAN in business as a cabinet-maker and turner. I had in my employ a youth in whom great interest was taken, and he was placed under my care in order that he might be well protected. He came to me at about the age of fourteen. He engaged the attention of the people where I then resided, as a singer, and interested them very much in various ways. After three or four years I found that he had been allured by bad company into the public house.

During that time I had become an abstainer. Singularly enough, the last barrel of beer we brewed was on the day on which I signed the total abstinence pledge; but what to do with the drink became a great difficulty. Well do I remember taking the last barrel of beer into the public yard, where there was a gutter, drawing the tap out of it, and letting it all run away. This lad was so vexed at this that he determined he would go and get more drink at the public house, and he did so. I felt very much concerned about him. On one bitterly cold February day, when the snow lay thick upon the ground, he had quarrelled with us about this drink. We always were saying we would not allow it. My wife was as good a teetotaler as myself, and perhaps something better. The boy declared he would go and enlist. I knew it would break his mother's heart if he did so. He left the house.

The next I heard of him was that he had found his mother's home, and that he had gone into a workshop in Derby. I could have called him back, but I was afraid to do so. I knew that if I demanded his return it might be his ruin, and, therefore, I let him stay under his mother's observation. He continued to drink for a considerable time.

One night there happened a serious and most interesting event. His mother in the night dreamed that he was sitting in a certain public house drinking. She got up, dressed herself, and went to the public house which had presented itself to her in her dream, and found him there at three o'clock in the morning. She called him out. The proprietor of the house attempted to repel her. She insisted upon it that she would have her son. She called him out, and he said, "Mother, mother! I shall have one day's drinking more, and then I will sign the teetotal pledge."

He did so. He kept his word. He became a consistent abstainer, and when, a short time after, I heard of him, he had joined the Baptist Church at Derby. The next I heard of him was that he was engaged in the advocacy of temperance in the villages. He was afterward engaged in going from place to place at greater distances and advocating the cause; and the next I heard of him was when I sent a letter to him—to my dear brother, Simeon Smithard, who was then at Derby, to ask him to go forth as a temperance advocate. He complied with the request, and for thirty years he labord in connection with the temperance cause. He was known in London; he was known throughout the country, and he was esteemed wherever he was known.

And Simeon Smithard, after more than thirty years' active labor in connection with this cause, at the commencement of 1878, suddenly passed away. He had lectured in the north, and the next morning got up suffering intensely from severe cold, and on that day he died. That incident alone would have made me a devoted adherent to the temperance cause, even if there had been no other reason.

A New Life.

EVELYN for a few moments pondered my question. She apparently could not understand what the dying thief obtained by looking to Jesus. At last she said, "I don't know."

" Well," I answered, " my book puts it in this way. Both thieves deserved to go to hell because of their sins ; both of them before they were nailed to the cross had sin in them, for they both had sinful hearts ; they were born in sin, and they were both sinners. And they had also both of them sin on them, the burden and guilt and punishment of their sins resting on them ; they both must suffer the consequences of their sin—both must go to hell."

" Yes," she said, " I see that."

" But now let us look at them again some hours later. They have been nailed to the cross, and one thief has looked to Jesus, but the other thief has not. Just look at the three crosses now. First, here is the thief who would have nothing to do with Jesus. Has he still sin in him ?"

" Yes," she said.

" Has he still the guilt of sin resting on him ?"

" Yes, he is just as he was before."

" Now, then, look at the middle cross ; look at Jesus. Has He sin in Him ?"

" Oh, no," she said, " He never sinned ; He was quite holy."

" But was there no sin on Him ?" I said.

" Was there, May ?" she asked.

" Yes," I answered, " don't you remember it says, ' The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.' It was not His own sin that was resting on Him, but ours."

" Oh, yes," she said, " I see what you mean."

" And now look at the third cross. There hangs the thief who has looked to Jesus. He still has sin in him ; till he gets to heaven, his heart will be sinful still. But he has no sin on him, for he has laid his sin on Jesus ; it is no longer resting on him : it is taken off him and put on to Jesus, and therefore this thief is saved. Now, do you see what looking to Jesus means ? It means that the thief looked to Jesus as the One who was being punished for his sin, and who was suffering in his place. Do you see ?"

" I think I do," said Evelyn.

" Well, all the people in the world die as one or other of those thieves died. All without exception die with sin in them, for the Bible tells us that ' If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves.' But those who look to Jesus as the One who has been punished in their place, though they have sin in them till they die, yet they have no sin on them, for the guilt and responsibility of their sins no longer rests on them, but on Jesus. You remember that hymn :

" ' I lay my sins on Jesus,
The spotless Lamb of God ;
He bears them all, and frees us
From the accursed load.' "

" Yes," she said, " I like that hymn very much. I do wish I could do it, May ; do you think I can ?" she asked.

" I am sure of it, darling ; Jesus is willing, Jesus is longing for you to cast your sin upon Him. He says to you, ' Look unto me, as the One who died instead of you ; look unto me as the One who was punished in your place ; look unto me, and be ye saved.' "

" Oh, May, I should like to do it at once," she said.

So I went down-stairs and left her alone, and yet not alone.

I did not see Evelyn again till I went up-stairs to her room for luncheon. She was lying quietly on the sofa where I had left her, but she called me to her side and whispered, " Oh, May, I am so happy now. Sin is still in me, but no longer on me, for I have laid it on Jesus."

I need hardly say how very thankful I felt to God for answering my prayer. It seemed almost too good to be true. A blessing that we have been waiting for, anxiously longing and waiting for, is always of double value when it comes.

From that day I began, as it were, a new life in Alliston Hall. Before this Evelyn used to dislike and avoid any approach to what she considered " religious talk ;" but now her great delight was to read a chapter with me in the Bible, and to ask me questions about anything which she did not quite understand.

I shall never forget that summer ; it was a very peaceful and a very happy one. I had every reason to believe that Evelyn's heart was indeed changed. Every one noticed the difference in her, and many, who did not understand what is the power of the Holy Spirit in the heart, wondered what was the cause of it.

There was one who rejoiced in this change in Evelyn quite as much as I did, and that one was Miss Irvine. She spent nearly the whole summer at Alliston Hall, and Evelyn, instead of avoiding her company as she had so often done before, delighted to have her with her, that they might talk together about heavenly things.

Day by day Evelyn grew in grace, and seemed more anxious about the welfare of her own soul, and of the souls of those around her. She was much braver than I was, in speaking to others about their eternal welfare. I often felt ashamed of myself when she told me how she had spoken to Clemence, or to one of the other servants ; and she did it in such a simple, natural way, that it was always well received, and never gave offence.

But, though Evelyn was growing in grace day by day, she was not growing in bodily strength. Indeed, as the summer went on she seemed to get weaker instead of stronger. The trouble she had had about her cousin Donald had been so sudden and unexpected that she had not recovered from the effects of it.

Evelyn never, so far as I knew, mentioned her cousin's name in Sir William's presence, and only once did she name him to me, when she asked me if I knew whether anything had been heard of him ; but I noticed how anxiously she asked for the newspapers every day, and with what trembling fingers she turned over the pages. There had been an account of the affair in the Times the same week that it happened, and Evelyn was continually expecting to find that Mr. Trafford had been apprehended. But there was no further notice of it in the newspapers, and, one day, Sir William told me that his nephew had evidently made his escape to some foreign land, and he did not think that he would ever be heard of again.

As the summer passed away, and the days became shorter and the nights cooler, Evelyn became no stronger ; she had a very troublesome cough, which kept her awake at night, and she looked pale and fragile.

Sir William was very anxious about her, and had many consultations with the doctors, and at last it was agreed that the best thing possible for her would be to leave England for a time and to spend the winter abroad.

The doctors said that the warmer climate would be good for her health, and Sir William felt that the excitement and pleasure of travelling would turn her thoughts, more than anything else, from her trouble and disappointment.

" And where do you think we are going, May ?" said Evelyn, when she had told me with great joy what her father had decided.

" I do no know at all, Evelyn," I said ; " I thought perhaps it would be to Mentone, or perhaps somewhere in Italy."

" Oh, no," said Evelyn ; " nowhere so commonplace as that ! Guess again !"

But I could not guess, so she told me, with great delight, that Sir William's plan was to go down the Mediterranean to Egypt, and then, if Evelyn was well enough, to go on in the early spring to Jerusalem.

" To Jerusalem ! Oh, Evelyn," I said, " you will enjoy that."

" Yes, and so will you, May," she said. " I know how you long to go there ; I was quite as glad for you as for myself, when papa told me."

" Oh, Evelyn," I said, " do you mean to say that I am going too ? I never dreamt of that."

" Of course you are going," she said, indignantly. " Do you think I could do without you ? Oh, May, isn't it delightful !"

It seemed to me far too good and too wonderful to be true. To go to Jerusalem, the city which our Lord loved, and over which He wept ; to see the hill-sides where He so often sat, and to tread the mountain paths on which His feet had so often walked—this seemed far too great a joy ever to be mine.

But there was very little time to sit and dream over it, for we were plunged at once into all the bustle and confusion which a departure from home for a long time causes in large households as well as in small ones.

We were to start in three weeks' time, for Sir William was anxious that we should get the sea-voyage over before the weather became colder and more unsettled. He very kindly gave me leave to go to the Manor House at Branston for a few days, that I might say good-by to my little sister before being parted from her for so long. I should never have thought of asking for a holiday at this busy time, but Sir William proposed it himself, and was good enough to say, when I began to suggest difficulties, that he should insist upon my going whether I liked it or not.

It was indeed a pleasure for me to see my dea little Maggie again, and the three sisters wer kindness itself to me. But they did not at all lik the idea of my going to Jerusalem ; indeed, at firs they even wanted me to throw up my situatio because of having to go abroad. However, whe they saw that it was of no use trying to persuad me to do this, and that I was looking forward t the proposed journey as to a most delightful an pleasant thing, they all united in trying to warn m of the consequences. Miss Jane had a very ancient book, describing the adventures and narro escapes of some travellers in Palestine many year ago, and she brought this book out from her book case, and read all the most alarming passages fo my edification, till poor Maggie was quite frigh ened, and clung to me, and said she would neve let me go.

I assured them that travelling in Palestine twent years ago was a very different thing, and that no the dangers were much less, and the difficulti not nearly so numerous. But Miss Jane did nothing but shake her head mournfully, and said sh should indeed be thankful if I came back alive while Miss Hannah and Miss Louisa actually she tears at the bare thought of the perils I was abo to undergo. However, I comforted them by promising them to write often, and I told them that would give them an account of all my adventure though I did not think they would be so excitin or remarkable as those of the gentlemen in Mi Jane's book.

When I returned to Alliston Hall I found th all necessary preparations were made for the jou ney. Sir William was anticipating it quite much as we were. He had travelled a great de when he was a young man, and he was very mu looking forward to taking Evelyn to some of t places which he had visited so many years befor

At length the last night came, when everythi was packed, and we had nothing to do but to sit the window and to talk of the journey before us.

I was feeling the reaction, which so often com after the excitement of preparations for a journe and was almost wishing that, after all, we were r going so far away. Who could tell whether should all return again ? Who could tell wheth I should ever see my little sister again ?

At this moment the door was opened, and a l ter was brought in which had come by the eveni post. The letter was from dear Miss Irvine, to s how much she should think of us while we we travelling, and how often she should turn the te which she inclosed, into prayer on our behalf.

" What is the text, I wonder ?" said Evelyn, she put down the letter. " Oh, I see ; here two cards in the envelope : one for you and one me."

She handed me mine, and the text seemed an swer to my fears : " The Lord shall preserve t going out and thy coming in, from this time for and even for evermore."

We left England, and began our delightful journey at the end of October. Evelyn improved in health and spirits from the moment that we started, and Sir William was thoroughly happy in witnessing the enjoyment of his child. I need hardly say what a treat this journey was to me. I had never been out of England before, and, therefore, everything abroad was quite new and strange to me, and I felt as if I was having a very pleasant and delightful dream.

We spent some time in Paris, and went about to all the places of interest both in and near the city. From Paris we went to Turin, where we rested for more than a week, before undertaking the long and tedious journey from Turin to Brindisi.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for December 26th. Golden Text, Heb. 11 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE three patriarchs, with whose history we have been occupied during the past quarter, are all named among the men of faith in the eleventh chapter of Hebrews, and it is said of them, "These all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise." What is the promise which they did not obtain? Purely the Son of God, His "unspeakable gift," whose coming was still in the future. But having faith, they had, as our golden text assures us, "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." There was in their communing with God some seeing of the day of Christ, but how far, and in what measure, we cannot understand.

Isaac, whose name means "laughter," inherited the fruits of his father's faith; he had no struggles such as Abraham passed through, no such a trusting of God in the dark as that to which his father was called when he had to leave his country, his kindred, and his father's house. Isaac was born in an atmosphere of faith, and came into an inheritance of blessing both spiritual and temporal. But even he must pass this fiery trial; and when God called upon Abraham to offer him up in sacrifice, it may be that Isaac learned the great lesson of his own condemnation as a sinner by nature, and through the substitution of the ram caught in the bushes he may have caught a glimpse of the future atonement of Christ.

The lives of Jacob and Joseph form a striking contrast. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much; and he that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much" (Luke 16 : 10). The home life of a child of God is his school and apprenticeship for a wider sphere either here on earth or in the future reign with Christ to which we are called. Family life is always the crucial test. A preacher may be an angel in the pulpit, but is he so to his wife, children, and servants? A writer may express the highest Christian principles, but does he carry them out in all business transactions, in his social life, in his journeys, n his comforts and discomforts? A lady may pay in her mother's meetings, and the poor mothers may hink, "What a gift in prayer she has?" But is every little incident—the delay of the butcher, the undone meat, the broken china, the torn dress of a child—really carried to God, and left with God n prayer, or does she make exceptions in her life of trust? An evangelist may weep over the souls of a town where he is laboring, but is the soul of a hall-keeper who forgets to open the doors to time, cabman who fails to keep an appointment and who loses him a train—are those souls so precious o him that the inconvenience is as nothing in re- pect to it?

Jacob failed in his home life. First he manifest- d the most utter selfishness with regard to his rother in the matter of the birthright and the pottage, and later in the unworthy and sinful way in which he obtained his father's blessing; it was of o account to him how much Esau might be the loser in soul or body, so that he himself obtained is object. Like many a one in all times, he ought the gifts of God rather than the Giver, and ishonored God by the way in which he sought fter the very blessing which He had promised im. Self was the centre of Jacob's life, and at first the centre of Jacob's religion, and thus he had such severe lessons to learn during his life of many changes.

With Joseph it was far otherwise. In his home life he maintained his integrity, although he stood alone; he sought nothing for himself, but God promised him much. While Jacob's idea was to grasp greedily after future blessing, as though it had to be taken from God by violence, Joseph communed with his God and received the assurance of blessing direct from Him. While Jacob, who was not his father's favorite, took advantage of his brother, Joseph, who was his father's favorite, was ready to serve his bretheren, bearing no malice to them notwithstanding their ill-will. Jacob fled from the face of his brother whom he had sinned against, and on his return to the land of Canaan feared to meet Esau; while Joseph, who was driven away guiltless by his jealous brothers, when he saw them again sought to do them good. The fear in this case was on their side, not his.

What, then, was the issue of these two lives? Jacob left no holy influence behind him in Padanaram, and although God had blessed Laban for his sake, yet he did not leave blessing behind him. On returning to the land of Canaan, we find strange gods more than once among his family. There was no high tone of godly life about him which could have led men to say, as they said of his father, "We saw certainly that the Lord was with thee." We find him constantly in doubt of God as to whether He would really be as good as His word, and fulfil to him the promises which He had made to him and to his fathers, and in his unbelief he always took means of his own to secure their fulfilment.

Again we find him always pressed down with the weight of circumstances, laboring under, struggling against them, often discouraged almost to despair, and he was a man of many fears. He was afraid of Esau, and afraid of Laban: afraid of the anger of the inhabitants of the land. When his sons told him that they could not go down a second time into Egypt except Benjamin went with them, he was afraid of loosing his darling son. And this was a man of God, and a man of faith too, yet one of little faith. His communion with God was fitful and varying, sometimes intense, as at Bethel and Penuel, sometimes lax when we find strange gods in his house; and that he who was called to dwell in tents built himself a house at Succoth (Gen. 33 : 17), which paved the way for the sad history of the thirty-fourth chapter. What so likely, when he abandoned the life of a pilgrim, as that his daughter should seek the acquaintance of other girls of her age? and thus friendship was made with the ungodly, and sin entered into his family.

With Joseph it was very different. However much in his home life his brethren hated him, they could find no ground for hatred in any sin of his; it is probable that their hatred was augmented by the very consciousness of his real superiority to them. Wherever he went, even among those who knew nothing of God, he left behind him the conviction that the Lord was with him. There was a dignity about the life of this young man which raised him above his youth and above his circumstances, which gave ruling power to the younger son, the slave, the prisoner. God had given him the commission to rule, and no force of circumstances could make him other than God had made him.

Far from being pressed down under the weight of circumstances, which in his life were far more difficult and discouraging than in his father's, Joseph seems to have learned beforehand that "all things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8 : 28), and he could have said with the Psalmist, "As for God, His way is perfect: the Word of the Lord is tried; He is a buckler to all those that trust in him. . . . It is God that girdeth me with strength, and maketh my way perfect" (Ps. 18 : 30-32). There was a wonderful dignity about the way in which the young Joseph rose to the command of the house of Potiphar. He left all so quietly and trustfully in the hands of God that instead of forcing, as it were, the fulfilment of His promise from the hands of God, as his father did, Joseph gave his full attention to his daily work, as though there were nothing else to occupy him. This is the true life of faith. If our trust in God is not sufficient to make us calm and confident under any circumstances which may arise, it is not real trust; elements of unbelief are mixed with it, and we are doubting God for some things while we are trusting Him for others. We could not do a greater wrong to our Father's heart.

Joseph did not give way to fear, because the Lord's presence was nearer to him and more real to him than any other presence. Once only did he make an effort to help himself, when he besought the chief butler to remember him; but this effort was unsuccessful, and he continued his labors in the prison with the same zeal and patience as before. There was no fitfulness about his communing with God. He did not need to put away strange gods in order to build an altar to the Lord; he did not drive a bargain with God, as Jacob did when he promised to give the tenth of all he should have, if God fulfilled His Word. He did not need to be overcome and weakened by the wrestling of God during a whole night. Joseph lived, breathed, walked, worked, ruled in the presence of God. Jacob only in his last days attained the rest of soul which belongs to a man living with God. Joseph's whole life was lived in it. Thus Joseph was made a blessing wherever he went, for wherever Joseph was there the Lord was, and that which he did the Lord made it to prosper."

Reader, is your life a Jacob life or a Joseph life? Are you a believer, and do you yet seek your own? Are you always struggling against circumstances and against your own heart? Are you not yet persuaded whether your cause is really in the hands of God or not? Is there still uncertainty as to what will be the issue of temptation? Then the Lord is to you as "a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night" (Jer. 14 : 8), and not yet as an abiding presence in you? But have you once given yourself fully over to the Lord to be His property that He may do what He wills with you? Have you ceased to will either for joy or sorrow, honor or dishonor, riches or poverty, work for God or suffering? Is it all one to you whatever may happen, so only it is the will of God? And are you quite sure that He is able to keep that which you have committed unto Him (2 Tim. 1 : 12)? Then you cannot but be blessed, although, like Joseph, you may have to undergo much suffering, much shame, much injustice from men, and you cannot but be a blessing, because the Lord will fill all the space which self evacuates, and in the most unconscious way you may bring blessing everywhere with you.

In these last days, before our beloved Lord comes to seek His bride, there is a special call to whole-hearted consecration to Him. It is not the open opposition of infidels, it is not the gross sins of the openly ungodly, which stay the progress of the Gospel. But when professing Christians fail to be upright, to "provide things honest in the sight of all men," (Rom. 12 : 17), when they enter into speculations with other men's money, when they become rich not by "honest trades for necessary uses" (Tit. iii. 14. margin), but by the accumulation of public houses or by large distilleries, by theatres, by tobacco, but anything which is not for necessary use, this is a stumbling-block to the progress of the Gospel. Again, when professing Christians show just the same anxiety about business, health, reputation etc., as the unconverted, how can these latter believe that the threads of their life are in the hands of Him who doeth "all things well" (Mark 7 : 37)?

It behoves us to raise again the standard of Christianity to its normal level by a life of trust and consecration—a life in which man may have no fault to find with us but that we are too unworldly, too like our Lord, in which His Word may be justified in our experience and in our lives, and He be glorified in our body and in our spirit which are His (1 Cor. 6 : 19). Self-interest is God's enemy; we need not fear for our interests if we are occupied with His. Let the world see once again a disinterested "little flock"—"one heart and one soul whose main feature is that they love one another, that all bitterness, malice, evil speaking is done away from them, that they live, yet not they—Christ liveth in them."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Situation in Ireland Grows more Ominous every day. Deeds of violence, intimidation, and reckless disregard for law and order characterize the operations of the Land League, and the local authorities are unable to check or punish the crimes, as witnesses fear to testify and juries will not convict. In four months 698 indictable offences have been reported in Connaught alone. For these only thirty-nine persons have been rendered amenable. Five hundred and seventy-seven persons, against whom offences have been committed, have through terror, or desire to shield the offenders, refused to give evidence, prosecute or assist the police. Lesser offences are also numerous. In Mayo there were 888 lesser and 236 indictable offences. The tenants have—for the present at least—confiscated the property of their landlords. A branch of the Land League now holds its own "courts" in various parts of the island, assuming to administer justice; this is equivalent to the establishment of Lynch law, in defiance of the government.

The indignation of the loyal portion of the people at the apathy of the government is freely expressed, and even the constituencies of England are astonished that the administration should suffer anarchy to prevail in Ireland without taking prompt measures for its suppression. Mr. Parnell having stated openly that no concession short of legislative separation from Great Britain will satisfy the League, Mr. Gladstone's hope of conciliating the people by a liberal land bill seems baseless.

"The Three F's" is the Watchword of the Irish Land League, and some curiosity has been excited as to what words the letter represents. They are: Fixity of Tenure, Fair Rents, and Free Sale. The demands of the League embodied in the watchword are, Fixity of Tenure: a tenant shall not be evicted so long as he pays his rent; Fair Rents: the rent not to be raised except at regular intervals and by public authority; Free Sale: the tenant desiring to leave his farm may sell his lease to any man who will buy his lease and stock, and the landowner shall accept such tenant. The advanced members of the League would not be satisfied with these concessions, as they are agitating for the abolition of rent altogether, but if the three F's are embodied in a Government bill and enacted by Parliament the moderate members of the League profess that they would be contented. When complaints are made of the high rents exacted for land in Ireland, it should be remembered, in order correctly to estimate the justice of the complaint, that the Irish measure of an acre of land is as one and three quarters to one acre statute or English measure.

Decay of Turkey.—Mr. Rosenberg Writes from Adrianople, in Turkey. This country and its people have been fearfully desolated by the war of 1877-8. Widows and orphans, the aged and the young, are running about the streets begging for a piece of bread. But since the late war the Christians have taken the reins into their own hands, and are making wonderful progress in every department, whereas the Turks are gradually degenerating, so that in a few years they will quite disappear as a power and nation from Europe. Christian preachers, Scripture readers, and colporteurs are working very hard among Bulgarians, Greeks, Armenians, and Jews, and doubtless much good will in due time result through God's blessing. In this lies our hope.

A Distressing Mining Calamity Occurred in a pit in Wales, on December 10th. About one o'clock in the morning the neighborhood was aroused by a loud explosion, and a shock like an earthquake was felt for several miles around. The mouth of the Penygraig pit was soon surrounded by an anxious throng of men, women, and children, eager to discover what had occurred. The pit was 450 feet deep, and upward of one hundred men and boys were known to be at work there. A volunteer party descended the shaft as soon as the attempt could be made with comparative safety. It was then found that there had been an explosion of fire-damp, and that nearly all the miners must be dead. Four men were found alive who had sheltered themselves in stalls when the first alarm was given, and they were brought to the surface in an exhausted condition. The entrance to the mine is choked with fallen rubbish, which it will take a long time to remove. Latest accounts state that at least a hundred lives have been lost. Only half a mile from the Penygraig pit is the Dinas Colliery, where a similar disaster occurred in January 13th, 1878, and in which the bodies of the dead miners still lie unextricated

Prince Jerome Napoleon has commenced the issue of a newspaper to advocate his claims as the representative of the Napoleonic dynasty. The journal is called Le Napoleon, and in its first number makes a vigorous attack on the present government of France. The programme it proposes is an appeal to the people on the question of the form of government they desire, and it demands at the same time that the system of taxation now in force should be reformed so as to give relief to artisans and peasants.

The Baroness Burdett-Coutts's Wedding with Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett is spoken of as likely to take place during the present month, but not in London. The negotiations with Coutts' Bank continue. It is stated that if Lady Burdett-Coutts marries her American suitor her income will be much reduced. Her existing income is said to be chiefly derived from her connection with Coutt's Bank; and, having been always charitably disposed, she has put by comparatively little. Her inheritance of £100,000 from a brother was due to an accident. He died intestate. His sisters, therefore, took out letters of administration. On investigation it was discovered that he had about £90,000 at his bank, and above £200,000 in bank notes which were hid away in different drawers in his house. Lady Coutts was never, it would appear, a partner in Coutts' Bank. A share in the profits was placed in the hands of trustees by the Duchess of St. Albans, and the annual proceeds went to Lady Burdett-Coutts during her lifetime. This is her sole connection with that celebrated establishment. This share was some years £100,000, and seldom under £60,000.

The War Between the Basutos and the British colonists in South Africa is proving much more difficult and extensive than the colonists expected. Their troops have made little headway, and one serious reverse has opened their eyes to the courage and able generalship of the Basutos. The Dutch, who form politically a powerful section of the colonists, while prepared to give energetic assistance in crushing the rebellion, unanimously condemn the disarmament of the Basutos which caused it. Now that the financial burden of the conflict is beginning to tell upon the colonists, they are not slow to utter complaints which make it sufficiently plain that they went to war without counting the cost. It is to be hoped that their present experience will make them rather more careful how they provoke the hostility of powerful tribes. The British Government agreed with the desirability of disarming the Basutos, but consider that the colonists have been too precipitate in trying to carry out that measure.

Mr. John Bright, the Eminent British Statesman, has been elected Lord Rector of Glasgow University. The event furnishes another illustration of the irony of circumstances. Mr. Bright began his career in the buttonless drab clothes, and broad-brimmed, low-crowned hat, usually worn at that time by members of the Society of Friends, but he has now been elevated to an academic rank of which the traditional costume is a flowing robe of scarlet. It is certain that he does not hold titles of honor in very great favor, yet he is Chancellor of Lancaster, and a Rector with the title of Lord.

A False Alarm Caused the Death of a Criminal in Vienna lately. A young man, about twenty-five years of age, lately took a room, No. 22, at an hotel known as the "Hotel Union," at Vienna. A deputation of the Vienna Town Council visited this hotel for the purpose of seeing whether some apartments in it would suit as chambers for a sanitary commission. They visited several rooms, and at length came to one marked No. 22. The manager threw open the door, announcing "the commission." Upon the entry of the strangers into the room, the young man became excessively pale. He passed his hand into the breast pocket of his coat, and then across his mouth. The visitors did not remain more than a minute; but as they were retiring, the young man fell to the ground, and, after a short convulsive struggle, died. A smal vial, in which a few drops of prussic acid remained, explained the cause of his death. It is presumed that upon hearing "the commission" announced, he thought it was the police com to arrest him for a murder, of which he had bee guilty, and in despair poisoned himself. Ho true is it that "the wicked flee when none pursueth."

A Remarkable Dream, Vouched for by a Correspondent of the London Daily News, is thu narrated: The Rev. John Monkhouse, incumben of Newlands, near Keswick, dreamed three times i one night that Forster's Bank, in Carlisle, ha failed. This dream so preyed upon his mind th though Forster's Bank was supposed througho Cumberland to be "safe as the Bank of England," he determined to go next day and withdraw a lar sum of trust money (I think some £5000) which had deposited in the bank for security. The mon was paid without the slightest demur, in ha cash, which rather staggered his belief in the tru of his dream. He went about his other busine in Carlisle, and hearing no whisper in the course the day as to the instability of the bank, and ha ing no other investment ready, he actually we and put the money back again. In a few days t bank failed, and he lost it all, except some ve trifling dividend.

Missionary Trees.—A Good Man in Bershire, England, had a cherry orchard. He thought himself what he could do for the missic ary cause, and at length selected two cher trees, the fruit of which he would devote most credly to the cause of missions. When h friends occasionally visited him, he allowed th the full range of his orchard. "Of every tree the garden you may freely eat," said he, "but these two trees you shall not eat—they belong God." The fruit was carefully kept separate a brought to market, and the proceeds remitted the Church Missionary Society.

A Lifeboat Capsized and Eleven of Its Cr were drowned at Wells, during one of the fe ful storms on the east coast of England recent Two were saved, and one of them relates: " tremendous sea broke quite over the top of boat and fell into her. It turned the boat qu over. All the crew had on their cork be The boat did not right for a quarter of an ho I saw them all drown, with the exception of t I shall never forget it. The cries and shr were terrible." What a blessing it is to kn that the lifeboat of the Gospel cannot be c sized, nor those who are in it lost.

MR. ELI JOHNSON was born in the State of Ohio in 1830, and his early years were passed on a farm in Warren County, on the Little Miami River. He is a kinsman of the well-known English philanthropist, Anthony Ashley-Cooper, Earl of Shaftesbury, being a descendant on the maternal side from the first Earl of Shaftesbury.

At the age of fifteen Mr. Eli Johnson was THROWN UPON HIS OWN RESOURCES.

His father died, and it was discovered that by some oversight the terms of his will precluded his son from deriving any benefit from the bequests in his favor until he should attain his majority, six years later. His nature, however, was not one to be overwhelmed by difficulties of this kind, and being firmly bent on gaining an education he spent the next few years in alternate periods of work and learning, earning in a few months a sum sufficient to maintain him other few months at school, and so by his own efforts acquiring a sound education.

Thus early taught habits of self-reliance, he was fitted, when he received his father's bequest, to use it wisely. He embarked in the dry goods business, and at a later period added to that enterprise a partnership in another business in Cincinnati, both of which prospered to a remarkable extent. During this period of worldly prosperity, Mr. Johnson underwent the great change which through all the vicissitudes of his subsequent career was, as it is to every earnest, sincere Christian, the controlling influence of life.

The Sunday-school was the scene of his earliest labors, but an event occurred which turned his attention to a class then much neglected. In his employ was a colored woman, who acted as cook for the establishment. Mr. Johnson interested himself in the spiritual welfare of his employés, and he learned with astonishment, from conversation with his colored servant, that in all Cincinnati there was no Sunday-school for colored people. "This must be looked into," said Mr. Johnson ; and the result of his investigation was the establishment in his own house of a colored Sunday-school.

was held. The object of the Bethel Sunday-school was so near akin to his own effort that he at once entered with spirit into the work, and soon became its chief manager. The effort was blessed of God, and from the small beginning when Mr. Johnson first became connected with it, comprised in thirty people assembled in a boat, it grew until, when circumstances severed his connection with it in 1868, it consisted of 2630 persons, who met in a building which cost $150,000, all paid, and having besides a trust fund of $100,000—probably the most important mission school in the country. The institution still flourishes, and is doing a good work ; it is chartered and permanent, and includes, besides its direct operations, a branch school, a reading-room, a lecture-hall, and a temperance restaurant.

In 1868 Mr. Johnson removed to Chicago, where his business increased and prospered. In that city his philanthropic Christian spirit was active, as it had been in Cincinnati, and he specially interested himself in the Home for Sailors, to which enterprise he contributed largely of both time and money. He also labored zealously in the work then being carried on in Chicago by Mr. D. L. Moody, and assisted in the efforts in which Mrs. Johnson was engaged, in company with other Christian ladies, for the rescue of friendless and fallen women. But God had other work for His servant to do, and the call to that work came, as it often does, in the guise of events which the world denominates misfortunes. Mr. Johnson parted from Mr. Moody one night on the Chicago street, a prosperous merchant noted for his munificent gifts to all religious and philanthropic enterprises ; the next few days saw him penniless—all the fruits of his worldly labor reduced to ashes in the great fire.

During the next three months all Mr. Johnson's time was taken up in the work of relieving his distressed fellow-citizens. Cincinnati no sooner learned that Chicago was burning, than, without waiting for any appeal to be made for assistance, thirty car-loads of cooked provisions were dispatched to the devoted city, with $200,000 in money. Mr. Johnson's name was well known in Cincinnati, and his late fellow-citizens displayed the confidence they felt in his integrity and wisdom by constituting him the almoner of the fund. Mr. Johnson selected New York as the scene of his future work, and commenced business there soon after the fire. But Providence had ordained that his life should be consecrated to a mission higher than commerce, and a severe accident, by which Mr. Johnson suffered the breakage of both knees, confined him to a bed of sickness for several months. There he lay in enforced idleness. He could not stir, and as he significantly said, he could but "look up." In those days of pain he believed he heard the voice of his Lord calling him to a great work. That work was a fight against the liquor traffic. From that hour Mr. Johnson has never faltered in the war. He has lectured in thirty-six of the United States, and in Canada, twice over England, twice over Ireland, once through Scotland, and once over Sweden.

In his work Mr. Johnson has lived, like George Muller, a life of faith. He has never bargained for payment for his labors, nor ever demanded money as his reward. But, like Mr. Muller, he has found that his bread has been given to him and his water has been sure, according to the promise. When he has been in need he has told his need to his God, and in no case has that need gone unsupplied. In this connection several interesting incidents have occurred. Among them is one deserving special notice as

A SPECIFIC ANSWER TO PRAYER.

During one of his visits to England a Swedish minister made an earnest appeal to Mr. Johnson to visit Sweden, where there had not been a total abstinence pledge signed for more than twenty years. He accepted the invitation, and Mrs. Johnson, who was laboring with him in England, having returned to America, he prepared for his journey. But he had not sufficient funds to pay his passage across the North Sea. According to his usual custom, the matter was laid before the Giver of all Good, and the mail brought a letter from a gentleman whom he had never seen, but who had seen an account in the journals of his intended expedition. The letter contained a pass to Sweden and back. Mr. Johnson set out, and on his return he called upon the donor to thank him, when to his surprise a second pass was handed to him, defraying his charges for his American voyage.

During his career as a temperance worker his faith has never wavered. Opportunities have presented themselves for obtaining a permanent income, but Mr. Johnson has always declined them.

PRESIDENT HAYES,

who has known him for many years, offered him a Government appointment, at home or abroad, but, while grateful for the confidence implied, Mr. Johnson preferred to work as he had done throughout, in simple dependence on the love of God. The following expression of the President's esteem was, however, accepted as an introduction which might increase his opportunities of usefulness :

> "EXECUTIVE MANSION, WASHINGTON, D. C.
> "Mr. Eli. Johnson is about to go abroad to labor in the interest of Temperance. I have long been personally acquainted with him, and it gives me pleasure to recommend him as a worthy, devoted, and very effective laborer in the cause. I trust that all who feel an interest in the mission will encourage and aid him."

During Mr. Johnson's

he was the means of converting the Archbishop of York to total abstinence principles. That distinguished prelate, who occupies the second position in dignity in the English Church, extended a cordial welcome to the American temperance advocate ; he embraced the doctrines of the temperance cause, and is now one of its most conspicuous advocates in Great Britain. While in Sweden the king o that country not only showed his sympathy by attending Mr. Johnson's meetings, but gave a donation of a thousand crowns to the cause. No less than 4393 persons signed the pledge during tha Swedish crusade, and of the nine interpreters employed by Mr. Johnson, every one became a tota abstainer.

The special work to which Mr. Johnson is now devoting his energies is that which has lately secured so triumphant a success in Kansas. It i that of obtaining a Prohibition of the different States. We have mentioned i previous numbers of THE CHRISTIAN HERAL the plan of this new departure, and its advantage in point of permanence and efficiency. During the agitation in Kansas Mr. Johnson, on the invitatio of Governor St. John, gave energetic assistance t the movement, and the New York State Temperance Society has secured his services as corresponding secretary for a like campaign in this State.

The distinctive feature of Mr. Johnson's labor i his unwavering conviction that there is without the operation of the grace of God. Th pledge is a subordinate feature in the work. It i useful and necessary, but his strong confidence i in the power of God to deliver the enslaved man Many instances are related by Mr. Johnson i proof of this belief. He was summoned on on occasion out of a prayer-meeting in Brooklyn t speak to a drunkard who had been given up b temperance societies as a hopeless case. He ha signed the pledge repeatedly, and had broken as often. He was persuaded to attend the prayer meeting and ask for the prayers of those present In doing so he said he had been a member of Christian Church, had occupied a high position i society in Charleston, having all the comforts an luxuries that money could purchase ; but owin to his drunken habits he had lost all his property and his wife had left him in despair. Prayer were offered for his restoration and conversio Those prayers were answered, and he is to-day after five years of total abstinence, a respected cit zen of Brooklyn. His wife has returned to him he is prospering in business, and his craving fo liquor is wholly taken away.

Some pathetic incidents necessarily occur almos daily in the life of a worker so earnest and devote as Mr. Johnson. From a host of such cases w select one, as showing how the intervention of philanthropist may save many lives from wreck.

A GOLDEN-HAIRED CHILD,

nestling beside a wretched-looking woman in th iron cage of a prison, enlisted Mr. Johnson's syn pathy and commiseration during one of his visi to that abode of sin and misery. He was prompte to inquire into the cause of the woman and chil being in that sad plight. He found that the woma had a drunken husband, whom she was obliged i his worst moments to tie to his bed to prevent hi procuring liquor, while she went out to work for living. A fire had occurred next door to the hous where she had lived, and in assisting her neighb to remove her goods she had stolen a package money and secreted it in her cellar, where it wa subsequently found by the detectives. The pres ure of her hard life was upon her, and she wa carried away by the sudden temptation to comm the grievous sin.

Mr. Johnson had an interview with the judg and urged him to commit the woman to his ca rather than to the penitentiary. She was release from prison on Mr. Johnson's bail, and after sever remands was finally given into his charge upon h giving security that she should appear before th Grand Jury, if called upon. The issue was or calling for deep thankfulness to God ; for not on the woman but the husband also was reclaimed both were converted, and have led consistent live since that day.

IRS. JOHNSON belongs to one of the old families o England whose ancestral history dates back to 10. There are only a few estates now in Engl that have remained in one family since that ti, and that still retain their old names; but one o em is Portledge, a large estate in North Devonsl e, close to the sea. Old family portraits, showi the successive generations for nearly 400 years p t, hang on the walls of the ancient Manor House. he first proprietor of Portledge was Sir Richard C fyn, Knight, a Norman General who accomp ied William the Conqueror into England.

lany years ago a branch of this family emig ted to New England, and in conjunction with P er Folger, the grandfather of Benjamin Franklii and several other persons, forefathers of wellk wn New England families, purchased from the I ans the island of Nantucket, off the coast of M sachusetts, and there established the first fleet o whaling-ships in America. The family had a n erous posterity, and Mrs. Johnson is one of the d cendants.

er father, the late Elijah Coffin, Esq., well k wn in the banking circles of our country, was a S thern gentleman, and went from North Caroli to Cincinnati, Ohio, where the subject of this s ch was born, and where many years of her life o active Christian usefulness have been spent. W en Mrs. Johnson was a little girl her parents m ed to Richmond, Ind., and there her girlhood passed till her marriage. Her father conti ed for twenty-five years cashier of a bank in R mond, and achieved no ordinary success by hi "methodical business habits and careful mang nent.'

r. Coffin paid much attention to the training his daughters, and used to delight in letting th accompany him when his business engage ts took him to neighboring towns. Miss y was his most frequent companion on those s. In the old days specie was usually car by hand from place to place, and the girl's de t used to be to bear the heavy "bank bag," er her father's eye, he meanwhile inwardly con ulating himself that she was learning lessons of onsibility and thoughtfulness. The same les laid the foundation of her capacity to under the far different responsibilities of her subse t public life.

rs. Coffin is said to have been "possessed of narkably well balanced mind and quiet force of acter joined to a deep Christian experience. attended faithfully to the guarded home-train of her children."

e have said that Mrs. Johnson lived at Rich d till after her marriage. In 1857 she returned incinnati with her husband, and in the follow year they were both converted, and joined the byterian denomination. Previously to that had been members of the Society of Friends. Johnson's father was during thirty years the f officer of the Society in Indiana, and being an active member of the American Bible So , and in other ways a public-spirited and large led Christian, his teaching and example could fail to leave a strong impression on her char r.

ne of M s. Johnson's first occupations as a stian worker, and one at which she continued en years, was the instructing of an infant class hree hundred children in a Sabbath-school, re her husband also was a teacher. She was , when a very young wife at Cincinnati, made a ager of the Home for the Friendless and en, and in a short time was elected correspond secretary of the same institution. Subsequent e was called to fill the president's place, and ough she declined the official position, she discharged the duties for two years, when her health failed and she gave up the charge.

During all that period of service, when the Home in Cincinnati was the only institution of the kind west of the Alleghany Mountains, Mrs. Johnson wrote a great deal and labored in other ways with the view of exciting interest in this particular species of reform; and she had the satisfaction of seeing Homes for the reception of outcasts opened in all the cities and many of the larger towns of the West. But her active mind and sympathizing heart led her to participate in many other labors of charity in Cincinnati. The was the scene of her constant and arduous work for several years; while, as a member of the Woman's Christian Association of Cincinnati, she diligently rendered help to various churches. She was president of the branch Ladies' Union Missionary Society, and saw its work extend to every part of the city. She also taught a "mothers' class" of one hundred women.

Mrs. Johnson accompanied her husband to Chicago in 1869, and there she engaged heart and soul in labors of the same kind with those that had occupied her in Cincinnati.

A REMARKABLE INCIDENT

occurred in connection with her work in that city. She accompanied Mrs. Elizabeth Comstock, the Elizabeth Fry of America, by invitation, to Springfield, Mass., and there the two ladies went on a mission of mercy to visit a dying woman in a house of bad repute. In a room adjoining the sick-chamber there was a girl, still young after thirteen years of a life of sin. This girl through a partly open door listened to Mrs. Johnson as she pointed the sick woman to the Saviour of the world; and as we read in Acts 16 : 14 the Lord opened her heart so that she attended to the things that were spoken, abandoned her dissolute life, and afterward found a refuge in the Home at Chicago.

But she had not taken a sight of Mrs. Johnson, nor shown herself to her; so when that lady returned to Chicago and went to conduct the usual service at the Home, although the girl was in the room, they did not recognize each other. But when Mrs. Johnson began to speak, the girl knew her voice, and astonished her by telling her story. That young woman is still living, and is not only a consistent Christian but a remarkable example of the power of the Holy Ghost to regenerate the heart.

Mr. Johnson's house was burned up and all his goods were destroyed in the Chicago fire of 1871, after which he and Mrs. Johnson moved to Brooklyn, N. Y., and they were in Brooklyn when the Women's Crusade began. By that time Mrs. Johnson had been restored from her long and nearly fatal illness. She had come out into the world again, a pledged total abstainer, the pledge being between herself and God, for she had told nobody her convictions concerning what she conceived to be her own duty in the matter. Up to that time Mrs. Johnson had never seen a temperance meeting, and had been in the habit of using stimulants herself and of keeping them openly in her house. She had never given the subject of total abstinence a serious thought until it was forced upon her attention by private letters from the West. But having prayed for light on the subject, and having received light (see Phil. 3 : 15), she formed her resolution, and then became at once one of the foremost workers in the temperance cause in Brooklyn. She was the first officer nominated to lead the new movement in that city, and she conducted the first public prayer-meeting of the First Brooklyn Woman's Christian Temperance Union after its separate organization, and has been elected its president each succeeding year At that first meeting she read the of Isaiah, chaps. 41, 43, and 44, which became the watchword of the Union. In less than three weeks she delivered an address before the New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was soon overwhelmed with invitations to speak in other towns and cities, over all the country east of the Missouri River.

She attended the first convention of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union, in November, 1874 at Cleveland, Ohio, and was there appointed recording secretary of the Union, to which office she was re-elected five successive years. She also became a member of the Publishing Committee which started Our Union, and she is now one of the special contributors of that vigilant organ of the W. N. C. T. U. She has attended all the National Conventions of the Union, save one held during her absence in Europe.

Mrs. Johnson has twice visited Great Britain. Her first visit was in 1876, when her husband and she addressed great meetings in London, Manchester, Liverpool, Belfast, and other cities. Perhaps their most important meeting was held on the 4th of July in that famous gathering-place of evangelicalism, Mildmay Park Hall, when the Earl of Shaftesbury presided, and three thousand people listened to Mrs. Johnson's graphic and interesting account of the ladies' temperance work in this country. At another meeting, held at Belfast on the 22d of August, three hundred persons consented to sign the pledge.

At Sunderland and at York Mrs. Johnson was invited to drawing-room meetings in the homes of the wealthy, and deeply stirred the hearts of many ladies of the upper classes, leading them to see their individual responsibility in the temperance cause, and to realize the powerful influence God has given to Christian women to exert for the well-being of all whose homes are touched or threatened by the rum-curse. In one of the lordly mansions the lady who had opened the parlors was observed to be weeping profusely during the meeting. The fact afterward transpired that that lady had never before heard the welcome gospel hymn,

"The great Physician now is near."

She had never heard a voluntary prayer offered, although she had attended divine service from her childhood; for she belonged to the "high" or ritualist party of the Episcopal Church. It was shown to her that Christ had "broken down the middle wall of partition" (Eph. 2 : 14), and she went boldly to the throne of grace and believed with all her heart.

Two nights of Mrs. Johnson's most interesting labor in London were spent until near midnight visiting thieves' kitchens. In those dark, shadowed, hidden places, she addressed mostly groups of from thirty to one hundred and fifty persons, whose principal means of subsistence was stealing. Thieves and drunkards of every description were present, who, after skulking about the great city during the day, had come in to prepare the meagre allowance they had obtained by pilfering, over one large fire, which they all used in common, previously to going out again for their midnight depredations. These miserable characters listened to the gospel temperance message with close and respectful attention.

We will close with a short account of the

with which Mrs. Johnson's name is so closely associated. Last year's annual report shows a total of above one thousand meetings held and visits paid by the officers of the Union, besides much and varied work done in the "systematic and wise distribution of tracts, Bibles, and temperance literature, responding to calls for temperance work in Sunday-schools and organized juvenile temperance work." Some of the meetings were of the most important kind, e.g., 130 visits to Raymond Street Jail, 89 meetings and visits in the Hospital and Woman's Prison of the Kings County Penitentiary, and 52 Reformed Men's meetings. Eighty-six thousand handbills of invitation to the Sunday meetings in Court Square Theatre were personally distributed. Those meetings were conducted by ministers and laymen of various denominations, followed by earnest addresses from Mr. James Sutherland, a converted actor, "whose deep experience of the power of Christ to save has qualified him to be a witness to the people." They were crowded to the utmost capacity of the house, and consisted largely of words of testimony by men who had been themselves saved from the habit of drunkenness. Inquiry meetings and personal conversation with scores of men followed every meeting.

THEBES perished. Tyre perished. Nineveh perished. Babylon perished. Their sins slew them. Great Britain and the United States stand in the front rank of nations, mightier and mightier as the years roll on. Why all this? Because every official oath taken under either government recognizes God. Every session of Congress or of Parliament is opened with prayer. Although these nations have sometimes done grievous wrong to the race and outraged the Lord, the main drift of their history has been in the right direction. Not their warehouses, not their shipping, not their commerce, not their worldly fortunes; righteousness hath exalted these nations.

Once a year, and for many years, at the opening of December, I have been accustomed to take ten days' absence. I find it invigorates me for the severe work of the winter, enlarges my ideas of public affairs, and allows me to touch shoulders with a great many people of many sections, and so my sympathies deepen and enlarge with the great masses of men.

What we ministers of religion want is not less acquaintance with books, but more acquaintance with men. It is a very small part of the world we see from our library window. The reason we do not reach the masses better is because we do not understand the great masses. The vast multitude stand aloof from our churches and shiver at the idea of a sermon, and go on with aching heads and fevered tongues and blistered feet and broken hearts uncomforted and unsaved; but when we go down among them, or up among them, as you please to call it, our grudges against certain classes of people are all gone, and we find that there are in the world

VERY FEW BAD PEOPLE.

The most of the recalcitrants of society are its victims. Only here and there after a day's ride will you find one man inherently determined to be vicious. As men fall off the platform of a rail train and break their necks, so men fall off the swift revolving vicissitudes of life and fracture their souls. The vast multitude of people who do wrong are the victims of society, not its antagonists, and so our indiscretions die in giving birth to helpful, healthful, and loving sympathies.

After ten days of absence I am always impatient to get to my pulpit and cry aloud the Gospel deliverance, for in about two thousand miles of travel I have had my eyes and ears and heart opened, and I come this morning to report to you, first as patriots and then as Christians.

I. And first I have to report to you

TWO THOUSAND MILES OF GOOD CHEER.

I have crossed the more thickly populated States some twenty times, and I never saw so much sunshine on the faces of the vast populations. For many years there were two words heard oftener than any other, and sounded through the rail trains and through the streets and across steamboat decks—two words so thoroughly married that when you saw one you expected to see the other—"Hard times."

Now you may travel many days in any direction and you will not catch a glimpse of that unhappy pair. Merchants of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Kentucky declared large sales, great demands, illimitable resources opening before the people. The three years of consecutive and almost fabulous harvests, together with the skilful management of the United States Treasury at Washington, under God have lifted the wave of national prosperity to a higher point than at any time in our American history. The rushing up of prices in 1862 was not a healthful prosperity; it was only the swelling of a tumor which had afterward to come out. The rising tide now is not lashed in by a tempest, but lifted by the full moon of the dollar of specie payment. The merchants, the great bargain-makers, the manufacturers, and the bankers all through the country tell me that the commercial prosperity of the land is going to stay; it is going to be thrifty livelihood for all classes of people, plenty to do, plenty to eat, plenty to wear. Yea, a surplus for those who have healthy brain and healthy hand that they may care for those who are decrepit and aged and sick.

It seemed to me that the freight trains laden with corn had no end as we saw them switched off on the side-track to let our fleeter express train pass. I saw hundreds of farmers at this late time in the year husking the corn in the fields simply because the product was overpowering. The seven years of business famine to be followed by seven years of business success. The vision of Pharaoh reversed; the seven lean kine to be swallowed by the seven fat kine.

I preceded these harvests to the seaboard, and this great crop of grain to the seaboard, and I tell you they are coming—coming the corn, coming the wheat, coming the cattle, coming the herds, coming the flocks. Get ready your stock-yards, open the holds of your ocean steamers, bring out your drays, enlarge your expectations; the dearth in business is to be followed by a kind of success such as we have never had. Starving a fever is no better rule for an individual than for a nation, and our nation was heated and in wild delirium, and it was necessary to put it down on small diet. Now healthful economies have come, and it is safe to put it on the full diet of prosperity.

The merriest Christmas table that was ever spread is going to be set next Saturday from ocean to ocean. More luxuries on it, more guests around it, more angels of joy flying over it. Chorus! Chorus of mountains—Alleghanies, and Rocky, and Sierra Nevada. Chorus of rivers—the Hudson, and Ohio, and Mississippi. Chorus of States—Northern, Southern, Eastern, and Western. Chorus—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will to men"

II. I have also to report to you as a result of my observation the prospect of the

of this country. I saw on the banks of the Susquehannah, and the Kentucky, and the Ohio the wrecks of a great many of the old political hulks. More professonal politicians have gone out of business in the last few months than ever in the same length of time, and the old parties which seemed to vie with each other in corruption, it is the general opinion they have quitted their old issues. The line of fracture is not to run any more between the North and the South. There is great danger it will run between the East and the West.

The question of Northern or Southern supremacy which ran along Mason and Dixon's line is to be superseded by the question of tariff or no tariff, running from the great lakes to the Gulf, and there will be no fracture, there will be no split. It will be a question of peaceful ballot-boxes and of corresponding legislation. The majority of the country will rule. If the majority want a stout tariff they will have a stout tariff. If the majority want free trade they will have free trade. That which the majority want the nation will have. And so I have heard the opinion on all sides where I have travelled that the old questions of nationality and of caste and of class are to be changed and adjusted.

It has been the great damage of this country that the German vote went solidly in one direction, and the Irish vote went solidly in another direction. Now, in the readjustment of parties, part of the German vote will go one way, and part another way; part of the Irish vote will go one way, and part another way. The salvation of the nation depends upon it. These questions must be changed. Because one man is born in Hamburg and another man is born in Dublin is no reason they should vote in opposite directions.

And so the question of the negro vote is to be settled. When both parties come to contend for the suffrages of the blacks, the blacks in all parts of the land will be rightly treated. All questions of foreign nationality, and all questions of color and race, are to be swallowed up in the intense question of the financial and moral welfare of the whole country. I report, therefore, the bright prospect of the speedy political regeneration of this country.

POLITICAL MATURITY.

III. Again, I have to report as a result of my observation the determination on the part of the people of the Southwest to give to the incoming administration at Washington, although the most of them voted against it, hearty support, and there is everywhere a belief that there will be good results. I heard on all sides the opinion that never since the days of Washington and Jefferson has there been such an opportunity for any man to do well for all classes of the country, North, South, East, and West—to do well for the nation—never such an opportunity as that which will open before the incoming administration, and there will be no obstacle put in the way. I did not hear one evil prophecy, not one prognostication of damage. Well, my friends, and as Christians I address you, it seems as if our radical troubles are to be gone forever.

Just as a child it seems cannot come to manhood until it has gone through all the infantile diseases, so it seems as if this nation could not come to stout manhood until it had one through a graduation of disorders. War of 1776, war of 1812, Aaron Burr's treason, Dorr's Rhode Island rebellion, South Carolina nullification, Civil War of 1860, Hayes and Tilden electoral commission, and other croups and scarlet fevers, until now the nation has come to full manhood, and I put my hand on its pulse and pronounce it well—well. Now, my friends, let us take one long breath of grateful satisfaction.

We used to be under the delusion that we were at peace. Why there is not a man under sixty years of age in this house that has ever seen any peace in this country until recently. Burning of the Pennsylvania Hall, in Philadelphia, through political agitation—was that peace? The throwing of the Alton Observer into the river because its sentiments were not admired—was that peace? In 1820 the whole air hot with political imprecation because of the admission of Missouri as a slave State—was that peace? In 1835 a school-house burned in New Hampshire because colored children were educated in it—was that peace? The great Methodist Church and the great Presbyterian Church split in fragments from North to South until the whole earth felt the shock—was that peace? Ah! no. On both sides it has been irony, Billingsgate—abuse, slander, blasphemy, war of tongue, war of pen, war of type, war of church, war of State, war of Congressional dispute—was bitter, furious, and relentless.

Thank God, at last the trouble is gone, and if you have read the proceedings of this opening Congress in Washington you have the intimation that the great educational and moral influences of this country are now to be discussed. For the first time in my life, for the first time in your life, there is perfect peace. Do you not see in what a different position all this puts our nation?

Republics and governments, like steamers, must have trial-trips. No prudent man wants to go in a ship when it makes its first voyage. He wants the machinery to be tested first. So was

OUR REPUBLIC ON ITS TRIAL-TRIP.

Some said it would go down. Others said it would sail on. The prospects were against it. Other republics had started and failed. Sensible men said, "Can it be possible that you can allow twenty millions of people to know there may be political preferment for them, and there not be a scramble for office that will swamp the Government as certainly as five hundred shipwrecked passengers rushing on one life-boat?" They said isn't possible that the State and the Federal orities should not come into collision perpetu- ; it isn't possible that the centripetal and the trifugal forces of the nation can balance each er." And this Government seemed a wild venlen as wise in literature as Thomas Carlyle pro- nced it an absurdity. Men as wise in states- ship as Lord John Russell pronounced it a ble-bursting nationality. Men as wise in the- y as Sydney Smith declared it to be an incon- ty. The least friction in the working of our onal machinery was deemed on the other side water as a sign that the whole fabric was go- to ruin, and they pronounced our election day eat mob and a great riot. Thank God, the trial has ended. The stokers, the engineers, and pilots all declare her seaworthy. All the na- of the earth are beginning to see that if a can go through so many storms without er it must be a very staunch craft, and now he political dock-yards of the world are begin- to ring with the hammers that are construct- ree governments.

e have graduated from our severe school disci- , and we are going forth to preach the Gospel berty and justice to all nations. Hear it, ye gn nationalities, and know there is one bubble will not burst. Hear it, ye enslaved nations urope and Asia, and rejoice at coming deliver- . Tell it to the winds. Thunder it to the Shout it amid the Alpine crags. Carve it ll the Norwegian rocks. Thunder it along arren beach of the great waters. God is just, nan was made to be free.

t, my friends, suppose all this prosperity h I report to-day, and which stirs your grati- as Christian patriots —suppose it is unsanc- ? Well, then, it means voluptuous ways, it s riot, it means magnificent woe, it means did rottenness, it means gilded death. Woe for the wine-vats if drunkenness wallows in . Woe to us for the harvests if greed sickles . Woe to us for the merchandise if avarice vs it. Woe to the cities if misrule walks . Woe to the land if God-defying crime de- es it. Oh! shall we not to-day pray God that e has given us such vast prosperity as a na- He would give us at the same time a spirit of ude, a spirit of consecration. He hath not so with any other nation. t into the ministers' meetings everywhere, hey were discussing revivals, and when a meeting was done they adjourned to resume the same subject next week, and in many of the churches there will be extra services by the pastors or by evangelists. Innumerable supplications to God and innumerable exhortations for the people. So I do not want you to have any idea that I take a doleful view of the spiritual condition of this country. God can by one stroke of His Almighty Spirit undo the satanic work of a quarter of a century. It took years to build a Spanish armada; it took the Lord Almighty one hour to destroy it.

There is going to be a great earthquake of spiritual awakening, there is going to be a great tornado of spiritual power. I found everywhere that is the anticipation, and the anticipation always precedes the coming of the Holy Ghost. What is the simple state of things in this country? Now we may deceive ourselves, but we cannot deceive God, and we cannot change the state of affairs by deceiving ourselves. What is the state of things? If there be a church with a thousand members, nine hundred of them are sound asleep; if there be a church with five hundred members, four hundred of them are sound asleep; if there be a church with a hundred members, ninety of them are sound asleep, and if they are wide enough awake not to drop the chalice on communion day, it is considered that will do: "it will do very well."

I suppose there are a great many whose names are on the books of the church who are deceiving themselves in regard to the things of eternity, and in the last day it will be found out that they made religion the second rate thing, the third rate, the tenth-rate thing instead of the first thing—the primordial thing. Well, we want a great awakening in pulpit and in pew. Alas! if in the day of judgment any one should say to any minister of religion, "I heard you preach five hundred times, and I admired the profundity of your discourses, and your well-rounded sentences, and your gestures, curvilinear, and stelliform, and I thought you were the prince of propriety; but you never told me about this great day for which I am not ready. Cursed be your rhetoric, cursed your art. You never told me of this day, and now I'm going down, and I'm going to take you with me. Hear, ye hosts of heaven, and ye hosts of darkness. It is his fault." And all the worlds will bring up the chorus, "His fault."

Oh! we must be aroused for Christian work, those of us who stand in pulpits, and I see many Christan ministers before me.

"'Tis not a cause of small import,
The pastor's care demands,
But what might fill an angel's heart,
If filled the Saviour's hands.

"We watch for souls for which the Lord,
Did heavenly bliss forego,
For souls which must forever live,
In rapture, or in woe."

O! that God by His gracious Spirit would set on fire the pulpits of England and Ireland and Scotland and America. Come, Holy Ghost! and hear, all ye people. What are you doing for yourselves and what are you doing for others? I address you in all love and kindness. Since some of you came to the stage of action a whole generation has passed off. They moved right on. You met them in business circles and in churches, but you brought no practical influence to bear upon their soul. They are gone—passed clear off the stage.

"Oh!" you say, "where is the fountain where I can wash off from my hands the blood of immortal souls." My Christian brother, do not waste your energy in that direction. That generation has gone. Now the question is what you would do for this other procession marching out of our stores hundreds of thousands of clerks—marching out of our factories hundreds of thousands of operatives, and marching out of our fields hundreds of thousands of husbandmen—marching on, to our work. We want a great awakening in the United States. All the clergymen and the Christian workers I talked with in all the cities told me that, and I feel it to be true. We want a revival like that of 1831, when Chatham Street Theatre was opened for religious services, and a committee went to the lessee of the theatre and said, "We want to use your theatre for a church." "A what?" said he. "For a church." Then the man burst into tears and said, "You can have it, and here are a thousand dollars to start with." And Mr. Finney preached eighty nights in the theatre, and thousands of souls entered the kingdom of God.

OH! LET US AROUSE

We want a great revival like that of 1857, when Burton's Theatre was used for religious services, and there were prayer-meetings in the old barroom, and for eighteen nights and days the place was thronged by people crying for God and heaven; and James Hall, Philadelphia, had mid-day prayer-meetings week after week, attended by three thousand souls, praying, singing, seeking pardon, rejoicing in mercy, and Philadelphia telegraphed to New York, "What hath God wrought?" and New York telegraphed to Philadelphia, "Praise the Lord, a hundred souls this day found peace;" and Cincinnati telegraphed to Charleston, and New Orleans to Boston, and city to city, and State to State, and there were ships that came into our harbor where on the one voyage, from captain to cabin-boy, all had been converted. Two hundred and sixty thousand souls reported saved that year. Oh! we want that multiplied by two, by five, by ten, by twenty. Eternal God, help us.

We want some praying such as has never been done in this country. If John Knox could get the lever of prayer under Scotland until he shook it from end to end, it seems to me there ought to be enough energy in a Christian church to put the pry of prayer under this continent and shake it from the Atlantic to the Pacific. There is where it will begin. It will begin in your heart, and in my heart, and in the hearts of God's people—earnest, importunate prayer.

There is no need of my going back and rehearsing in your hearing instances where God heard prayer. There is no need of telling of Hezekiah and his restored health, or of Elijah and the great rain, or of the post mortem examination of the apostle James, which showed that his knees had become callous through much prayer, or of John Welch and his plaid, or of Richard Baxter, who stained the walls of his study with the tears of prayer, or of George Whitefield, who again and again was found flat on his face crying unto God for the salvation of the people

There is no need, my brother, my sister, that I go back to those historical instances. I turn in on your own consciousness at that time when you felt your soul was guilty, and you cried for pardon and got it; or the time when you thought your child was dying and you cried to God, and He cured it; or the time when your fortune failed, and you cried to God for bread, and He put into your empty pantry the cruse of oil and the measure of meal. But why need I bring any illustrations either from history or your own consciousness. Rather than that I just put down at your feet, and tell you to mount it. "Ask and it shall be given you. Seek and ye shall find. Knock and it shall be opened unto you." Put your right foot on the lower rung of that ladder, then your left foot on the middle rung, then bring your right foot again to the top rung of the ladder, and hold on until you see the wave of divine blessing dashing clear above the top gallants. I do not know how you feel, my friends, but I feel I must have the blessing, the overwhelming blessing of God on my own soul and on your soul. Whether by my life or by my death, Oh! Lord, save the people.

If from the mound of my grave more souls can step into the kingdom of God than by my life, let me die now. Oh Lord! it is sweet to live for thee. Methinks it would be pleasant to die for thee. If in the Napoleonic wars six million men fell for worldly ambition, and if in the wars of the Roman Empire one hundred and eighty million fell for worldly glory and for the renown of the empire, shall there not be one regiment of us who would be willing to die for our Captain of salvation, for the Hero of the ages, for the Champion of our redemption? Come, Holy Ghost. Come, the rushing, mighty wind. Come, the tongues of fire!

ROCHESTER TOWER.

By Miss M. A. Paul.

The Cafe Breakfast at Rochester—First Visit to the Castle—Salome's Sorrow—Mrs. Fleet's Interposition—Cecil's Visit.

CONSTANCE ANERLEY and her little friends noticed in Rochester a small, foreign-looking establishment, marked "Café," where everything appeared clean, neat, and tasteful.

Here at least the shutters were down, and from the room within came the sound of singing and of busy preparation for the expected guests. After standing a few minutes in the outer room quite quietly, Constance, with an amused smile on her face, knocked on the floor with the end of her parasol. This proceeding stopped the song abruptly, and immediately brought forward a good-looking young Italian, sweeping brush in hand, with the brightest of dark eyes, and a red glow on his somewhat swarthy cheeks, even features, and white teeth that shone as he smiled, and looked as if they, too, were subjected to plenty of vigorous brushing and cleaning.

"Can we have some tea at once, if you please?" asked Constance.

"Yes, madame. Tea will you have, or chocolate?"

All the children declared in favor of chocolate, as a novelty, and the little party were ushered into the pretty inner room, where the floor was painted like a tesselated pavement, and the whole arrangement of the place bespoke other than English hands. It therefore occupied the attention of the children agreeably enough till, in an incredibly short time, four cups of delicious chocolate, made as only foreigners can make it, bread and butter, and half a dozen boiled eggs were placed on the marble-topped table before them, while their young Italian waiter attended to their wants with the utmost politeness. Between this service he set the room in greater order, kindled a fire of coke in the brass-fronted grate, and increased the general air of comfort every minute. Robbie partook of breakfast with the utmost satisfaction, which was increased by the fact that a railway bridge was to be seen from the window. He said he considered the meal far exceeded in quality and style any other meal of the kind of which he had before partaken, for the novelty in itself was to him a charm.

Having settled the very moderate amount of their bill, the four excursionists proceeded to the castle, to have an early view of the place, which they had determined to investigate more fully later in the day.

Gundulph's Tower of Rochester Castle may very properly be described as the home of the doves; the number of pigeons and doves which have their habitat in the noble old ruin must be very large indeed.

Their soft cooing notes remind one forcibly of music, as it were a living Æolian harp. It charms the listener, and fits in with the beauty of the scene, just as in the ancient castle of Baden-Baden the winds from the Black Forest sweep over the chords of the harps stretched across where the windows formerly had their place, and tell weird legends to the listening ear attuned to hear them.

The children, and Robbie in particular, wished to ascend the tower at once and explore every nook, but Constance decided that they must forego the present and very great attraction of the hundreds of pretty birds, and go first to Fern Cottage to announce their arrival. She accordingly made a few inquiries of the female custodian of the castle grounds, and was directed to the pretty little residence beside the Medway, where Salome still lodged with her worthy friends, Mr. and Mrs. Fleet.

Three months had passed since the sad death of her husband—months that she had spent in extreme retirement, seldom walking out till dusk, shrinking from the notice that she dreaded might attend her through the publicity respecting Orlando Stanley's death.

There had been such conflicting evidence respecting the alleged assault, there had been such sad proof that he himself had begun the quarrel with his assailant which had ended so tragically, so fatally, there had been so much indirect influence brought to bear upon the case, and such clever counsel enlisted for the defence, above all, Salome, feeling her ignorance of the truth so keenly, had so persistently refused to prosecute, that the punishment awarded to the officer had been simply imprisonment for six weeks for aggravated assault. Salome earnestly desired that he might profit by the quiet hours and days which he must spend alone, in which he might think over the part he had had in a fellow-creature's death. She knew, alas! only too well, that it would have been just as possible for the assailed to have been the assailant, and she felt thankful, indeed, that she had been spared this still deeper misery.

Poor Salome! there was considerable danger lest the extreme apathy which was creeping over her more and more day by day should sap her physical powers, and gradually lead to utter nervous prostration or premature decline. Mrs. Fleet, after pondering the matter a long while, ventured again, as she had done once before, to write to Eglinton Terrace and suggest a visit from Emily Anerley.

Emily would gladly have gone at once on receipt of this letter, but Mrs. Anerley was wholly averse to her doing so.

"I am very sorry for her, my dear," she said, "of course; but since the death of her miserable husband matters are wholly changed. If we make advances it might seem as if Cecil were inciting us to do so, and I shall be very sorry indeed if Cecil is so foolish as to determine to marry her after all that has occurred. It would be much better in every way for a young man in his position, and with his increasingly good prospects just now"—and Mrs. Anerley smiled complacently—"if he kept himself altogether aloof from a young woman who has been so unfortunately circumstanced, and who has placed herself, by her false representations as to her condition, in a very odious light in the eyes of many, myself included. You are very partial to her, Emmie, and far be it from me to blame your generous devotion to your friend; but I feel it my duty, as in some sense the head of this household since your dear father's death, to be particularly careful not to seem even to sanction or pass over the deceit that was practised upon us all. Don't interrupt me, Emmie; I was going to add, turning from this painful subject, that I can but think, from the quick promotion that has come to Cecil, that Mr. Robins's daughter has very likely taken a fancy to him. And think what an eligible match that would be."

"Yes, mamma, but—" Emmie hesitated, unwilling to offend her mother by expressing her real opinion.

"But what, my dear Emmie? I wish you would finish your sentences, said her mother, with just a shade of annoyance in her tone.

"I can hardly fancy," said Emmie then, "that any one who has ever loved such a woman as Salome Stanley could possibly be content with Miss Robins."

"What do you mean, Emily? What is the matter with Miss Robins, pray? She is, I am sure, extremely ladylike, and has a grand style about her that I should have thought young men would admire. If she be a little imperious, Cecil would easily put up with that, he is so good-natured."

"She is so different to Salome—as different as it is possible for one woman to be to another I feel the difference, mamma, though I cannot describe it."

"You are perfectly right in that, Emmie, but so much the better for Cecil's prospects. If she were like Salome he would compare them, and there would be an end of the whole affair, I have no doubt, young men are so foolish."

Cecil's entrance put a very summary end to this conversation.

"Have you any message for Salome Stanley, Emmie?" he asked, very much to the surprise of both his mother and sister.

"Why, Cecil?" asked Emmie.

"There are some business papers I have attended to for her, which she must sign in the presence of a witness I have thought it will save trouble if I take them to her myself in the morning. Have you heard from her lately?"

"I should think you must have done so yourself, Cecil," said his mother, in a tone and manner that were certainly not expressive of pleasure.

"You are right, mother," replied the young man not noticing, or not at least appearing to notic this; "but she has confined herself to purely business matters, merely answering some formal questions I had to send to her, and not taking any notice whatever of my queries respecting herself."

"I had a few lines from Mrs. Fleet to-day, Cecil," said Emmie.

"Then she is ill?" he asked, so hastily and s anxiously that Emmie thought her mother coul not possibly mistake the state of his feelings toward Salome still and in spite of all.

"Not ill, I hope, but very sad and dull, an spiritless."

"I was afraid so," he rejoined; "how could be otherwise? How much I wish she had you wit her, Emmie, or even that she could go on with h old work to ever so small an extent. Don't th little ones at the crêche want anything she coul make for them? Do commission me with a message to that effect."

"A few clothes, frocks, and aprons, and litt boots for the babies would be very acceptable ju now, for our stock is almost exhausted, and som flannel garments, for before long winter will be approaching, and nothing keeps sickness off the delicate ones like new flannel," replied Emmie, wh entered at once with ready sympathy into h brother's scheme for prosecuting two good aims once. "Oh, and Cecil, if she could make a fe more scrap-books, like she did before, they woul give the children ever so much pleasure."

"I will be sure to remember, Emmie," he sai with a smile. Cecil had looked graver and old of late; his mother had interpreted this gravity mean business cares, but perhaps she knew to well in secret how much it had to do with his an iety and perplexity about Salome.

So it came to pass that when Constance Ane ley opened the gate at Fern Cottage, and entere the garden with her three little companions, Ce Anerley was sitting beside the window in Salon Stanley's sitting-room, into which he had not ke before been introduced, and neither Salome n himself were quite in the mood for the interruptio though both would have been slow to acknow edge it.

"Who is this coming in? Why, what on ear is the meaning of this? Here are Constance a some of the Mitchell children, I suppose," said C cil in a tone of blended amusement and vexation.

Salome looked puzzled and surprised, but did n speak, though Cecil noticed that into her pale fa came a beautiful flush of rosy light, as exquisite the effect of sunrise on a snow mountain.

"Things must take their course," said Cec not quite clear what he meant by this observatio "Don't trouble, Salome," he added, smiling ir sistibly as he thought of his sister's extreme su prise to meet him there.

Constance's clear, cheerful voice could be hea without. "Is Mrs. Stanley at home?"

"Yes, miss," replied Mrs. Fleet, with evident some slight hesitation.

"Is she engaged?" queried Constance.

"Well, yes, just at present, miss."

"What time do you think I could see her? W you say Miss Constance Anerley has come o from Canterbury?"

"Anerley!" repeated Mrs. Fleet, "Anerle why, Mr. Anerley is only—"

But before she could finish Cecil opened t parlor door and caught Constance in his arm "My dear sister, how glad I am to see you!"

"Cecil, you here!!!" exclaimed Constan as soon as she had at all extricated herself fro his warm embrace, and in a tone that would r quire quite a regiment of notes of admiration to e press the depth of its amazement.

"Yes, I am here, my dear girl," said Ceci "surely that is self-evident; and what a love day you have chosen to give your young folks sight of Rochester Tower! Now you must intr duce me to these charming little ladies, and th sturdy young gentleman, who I quite believe will prove to be the Master Robbie of whom I have heard so much."

The children were delighted with Miss Anerley's brother at once, and he very soon proposed to take them out and show them the wonders of the town and the marvels of the shops, while Salome and Constance enjoyed a quiet chat.

"Then, in the afternoon," Cecil said, before he left them, "as I have business with Salome, I shall propose that you, Constance, take them to the old castle for a full examination of its beauties."

All concurred willingly in this arrangement. If either of the adults felt just a little chagrined and disappointed at a mutual though unintentional inteference with preconcerted plans, neither of these feelings were shared by the children, who were delighted with kind Mr. Anerley, charmed with the pretty little garden of Fern Cottage, and especially interested in the bridge and the river, while they deemed the excellent dinner Mrs. Fleet had quickly planned and cooked the very nicest they had ever eaten.

PROPHECY ABOUT BRITAIN.

By an Irish Rector.

THE Rev. Dr. Hales, an Irish rector, and an able and voluminous writer on chronology, dated the 1260 years from Mohammedanism in 620 to 1880, about or soon after which period he expected the slaughter of the witnesses to occur, as predicted in Revelation 11 : 3 to 11. He said in his "Synopsis of the Signs of the Times," in 1817 :

"From the days of Mede this tremendous prophecy has been generally understood literally to indicate a final suppression of the reformed churches and massacre of their pastors for a short time of three and a half years, before the expiration of the persecuting period of 1260 years ; during which every religious establishment shall be apparently extinguished, to the great joy of the apostate faction and infidel persecutors. The uncommon atrocity of this last persecution is marked by the refusal of the persecutors to permit the burial of the witnesses after their massacre, which was usual in other persecutions ; thus the bodies of John the Baptist, of Christ, and of Stephen were given up to their friends to be interred by Herod, Pilate, and the High Priest.

"There is abundant reason to dread that as the persecution of the witnesses by the Jews, and by the Pagan Emperors of Rome, began with the house of God, with Stephen, James the elder, James the Lord's brother, Paul and Peter, as Peter himself foretold (1 Peter 4 : 17), so will they end with the house of God under the reign of bigotry, infidelity, and their common offspring fanaticism, so strongly implied in our Lord's desponding question, 'Nevertheless when the Son of man cometh (in the clouds of heaven at his next appearance) shall He find faith on the earth?' or Christianity anywhere established in its primitive purity.

"This last persecution is to take place within the precincts of 'the great city,' or territories of the mighty Roman Empire ; We are afterward told that in the ensuing judgment and earthquake 'the tenth part of the city fell' whence we may collect that this persecution will take place in one of the ten kingdoms into which the Roman Empire was split. Of these kingdoms the most eminent for vital religion is unquestionably Great Britain, where the remnant of the faithful witnesses that survive the dreadful persecution of the superstitious and infidel powers, which have so long ravaged and are still ravaging on the Continent, may be considered as now collected.

"To England, therefore, 'the tenth part of the great city,' are we compelled to look for the last scene of persecution, and principally to her 'street,' or most populous region. And the 'street,' by way of eminence, may perhaps chiefly denote London and its environs—that greatest seminary of religion and vice ; where we verily believe there are to be found more intelligent and enlightened witnesses to suffer persecution than in any part of the world, and a multitude of bigots, infidels, and fanatics to inflict it. And where, from her boundless commerce as queen of the ocean, spectators cannot be wanting of 'peoples and tribes and languages and nations,' from the four quarters of the world, to witness the catastrophe. The resemblance indeed is so striking that though we shudder thereat, and deprecate the doom, we are forced most reluctantly to profess and maintain it.

"However gratifying, therefore, it would be to our own and the public feelings to say with some that England is secure, that Great Britain and Ireland have nothing to fear from this fatal persecution of the witnesses, 'because (as erroneously alleged) the time of this great persecution is already past,' we dare not 'speak smooth things,' nor 'prophecy deceits,' because 'the Lord is against the prophets that smooth their tongues,' and 'Woe to the prophets that see visions of peace' and 'sew cushions under every pillow."

"These countries and their united church we are strongly and irresistibly persuaded have much to endure, much to suffer, under the remaining vials of wrath, though we humbly trust they will pass through their last trial like gold, purified and refined in the furnace of affliction. A little while and we shall not see her during a short suppression beneath the troublesome waves of this world, and again a little while and we shall see her emerging much purer and fairer than ever, after her last baptismal purification."

[Dr. Hales' prophecy will be fulfilled probably within about ten years, so that, considering he published it sixty-three years ago, he is not far wrong. Fenianism and the Land League will prove potent factors in producing disorganization, which will at last culminate in such disturbances and troubles as he predicts.—ED.]

ANTICHRIST'S COMING COVENANT WITH THE JEWS.

By Rev. Andrew Bonar, D.D.

The Seven Years' Covenant—Antichrist will be Worshipped—The Last Half of the Week—The Unequalled Tribulation—The Raising of the Two Witnesses—The First Napoleon an Illustration—Indications of Antichrist's Programme.

AS the times of the Gentiles draw to a close, Scripture indicates the return of the Jews to Palestine as a nation, although in unbelief, and it is then that Antichrist, called the Prince that shall come, will make a seven years' covenant with the Jews according to Daniel 9 : 27.

Although it is only with the Jews that this Antichrist will "confirm the covenant for one week," yet ultimately the whole ten kings of the Roman earth will join together in giving their kingdom to him until the words of God shall be fulfilled" (Rev. 17 : 12, 13, 17). Finally, Antichrist will "plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas (the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean) ;" in the glorious holy mountain (a name given alone to Mount Sion at Jerusalem), and there shall come to his end and none shall help him" (see Dan. 11 : 44, 45).

His coming is declared to be with all "deceivableness of unrighteousness." He will adapt himself, just as the first Napoleon did, to the prevailing system of the godless times he appears in, and especially to the prejudices of the Jewish people, who, replaced by His help in their own land, once more as a nation, with their great wealth, will rise into importance there. In this "deceivableness" also, it is that the covenant is made with them for the whole remaining week. All the world will (Rev. 13 : 3-8) wonder after him, and not only wonder after, but worship him, and the Dragon too, "who gives him his power and great authority." How fearful to think even of such an apostasy as this ; well may it be called "The Apostasy," connected as it is with this prince that shall then have come, and shown himself to be that "Man of sin," for in the midst of the week (although his covenant, such as it was, had been made for the whole), he throws off the mask and shows himself "that he is God," with a false prophet, working miracles before him in the power of Satan himself—the mock Trinity of Hell, the Dragon, Beast, and False Prophet, then shown in opposition to the Trinity of Heaven.

The last half of the seven years, when the covenant has been broken, are the times of

of which so much is said in Scripture. God has mercifully shortened those days, and told His people in every different mode of expressing it what the limit is—viz., "the midst of the week," or hebdomad of seven years, that is, three years and a half ; the "1260 days ;" the "42 months ;" the "time, times, and half a time ;" all expressing exactly the same duration, and all, if taken with the context, pointing distinctly to the same dreadful period. During it God will raise up Two Witnesses, doubtless individual men from what is said of them, whom He will miraculously protect during the three and a half years of their testimony, inasmuch as He has never left Himself without a witness on the earth.

In France, before the Revolution of 1793, a well-known "falling away" or "apostasy" occurred, following upon the doctrines taught by Voltaire, when a national decree was passed that death was a perpetual sleep. The scenes of the Reign of Terror which followed showed what man will dare to do if left to himself, and called forth Napoleon Bonaparte, who showed the features of the Antichrist, flattering at first the system he found prevailing, while using it all the while to establish himself in power. . . . So the Antichrist will not at his first appearance shock the prejudices of those whose faith he at last overthrows, for he is to come in "by flatteries" (Dan. 11 : 21).

In France, Napoleon Bonaparte was a Roman Catholic, and in Egypt a worshipper of Mahomet, till finding himself, as by and by Antichrist will do, fairly established in power, he dropped the deception under which he had entered, proclaiming himself the monarch and only source of authority. "La France ! c'est moi" (France ! it is me), was the laconic way in which he announced it. What the successor to his name and authority may be raised up to accomplish is yet to be seen, but already the tendency is clearly toward a still more extensive development of the clay-iron principle of government which is to prevail in both feet of the Image, before the ten toes of it are developed. Such an instance as this should cause us to ponder well, when we read of a still future and more fearful "falling away," which is to distinguish it from others. In the original it is styled emphatically "the apostasy" (2 Thess. 2 : 3), with the revealing after or out of it of "that man of sin, the son of perdition, who will oppose and exalt himself above all that is called God or that is worshipped : so that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God."

We are told, in Daniel 7 : 24, that the ten horns out of this kingdom (the Roman Empire) are ten kings that shall arise, and another (the Little Horn) shall rise after them. The ten kingdoms must therefore appear before Antichrist, inasmuch as he rises after them. . . . The remarkable division of the Roman earth into ten kingdoms has not yet taken place, and the Antichrist, who arises after them, is of necessity future also. The limits of the Roman earth are sufficiently known to all ; and no division of it, which does not include the whole, can be said to have fulfilled its division into the ten toes or kingdoms predicted at the time of the end. The iron legs of Daniel's prophetic image (Dan 2 : 31-45) mean the Eastern and Western divisions of the Roman Empire, and the Eastern embraces the portion most important in Bible history—namely, the Holy Land, Syria, Egypt, Turkey, and Greece.

In Dan. 7 Antichrist is foreshown rising out of the ten kingdoms into which the Roman Empire will then have been divided, while in Dan. 8 he is shown as rising out of the four horns or kingdoms into which the Grecian Empire was divided under Alexander the Great's generals (namely, Greece, Turkey, Syria, and Egypt). In this there is no discrepancy, for the Roman Empire received its most valuable additions from the territories which it wrested from those successors of Alexander ; all, therefore, will be accomplished should Antichrist rise out of the Grecian portion of the Roman earth in the latter time of their kingdom when the transgressors are come to the full (Dan. 8 : 23).

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress has Commenced the Consideration of the refunding question, and the debate that has already occurred indicates that the subject will not be settled without a considerable conflict of opinion. The bill as reported from the Committee on Ways and Means does not embody Secretary Sherman's recommendations. It is the opinion of the committee, indorsed by some bankers and commercial men who have facilities for gauging the tendencies of the money market, that there will be no difficulty in disposing of the new bonds at par if they pay only three per cent of interest, and it appears probable that the Secretary will be limited to that rate. There is some apprehension felt lest in effecting the operation a sudden contraction of the currency may be caused. The banks, being large holders and issuing notes against their deposits, would probably find it to their interest if the bonds failed to pay adequately to sell them and withdraw their notes from circulation.

A Commission to Confer with the Poncas has been appointed by the President. It will consist of five gentlemen, who are instructed to ascertain the facts in regard to their recent removal and present condition so far as is necessary to determine what justice and humanity require should be done by the Government of the United States in regard to them, and to report their conclusions and recommendations in the premises. The names of the three commissioners already appointed are General George Crook, United States Army; Bishop Clarkson, of Nebraska, and Walter Allen, of Massachusetts. It may be hoped that the commission will be the means of doing justice to this injured people, whose removal Mr. Schurz admits to have been unwise.

The Education Bill Passed by the Senate on December 17th gave rise to considerable discussion on the feature known as the Teller amendment. By the provisions of the bill the proceeds of the sale of public land and the earnings of the Patent Office are to be funded at four per cent, and the interest divided among the States for educational purposes in proportion to their illiteracy. The bill is projected in the interest of the colored race in the South. The Teller amendment which was adopted in committee was lost by a tie vote in the Senate. It would have largely increased the present usefulness of the measure, as it provided that the proceeds themselves of the land sales and patents, and not the interest, should be given to the States. It was urged by the supporters of the amendment that the colored people now need the benefits to be derived from this money much more than future generations will need it, while the interest upon the money will not be sufficient to confer any appreciable benefit until the proceeds of several years' operations shall have accumulated.

The Sales of Liquor in the United States in 1871 were estimated by the Bureau of Statistics at $600,000,000. The aggregate wages paid by all the manufacturing establishments in the country, as shown by the census of 1870, was only $775,584,343, an excess of less than thirty per cent over our drink bill. The same census gives these annual values of leading manufacturing industries: Flour and grist mill products, $444,985,143; molasses and sugar, $119,325,279; cotton goods, $177,489,739; woollen goods, $155,405,358; boots and shoes, $146,704,655.

The total value of church property in the United States is $354,483,581, or the cost of seven months' drinking. Or, again, the census states the total aggregate of State taxation in 1870, including therein all State, territorial, court, and municipal taxes, as $280,591,521—not half the direct tax the liquor consumers lay upon themselves.

The Apprehension that Polygamy, if not promptly checked, would spread to other localities receives confirmation in the message Governor Neil, of Idaho, sent to the Legislature on December 16th. He says that polygamy is being rapidly introduced from Utah. The Territory is in danger, and is becoming like Utah. He expresses the hope that the Legislature will adopt measures to crush out the practice. He also advises the punishment of those who preach the doctrine of polygamy.

Among the Disastrous Fires of the Past Week the burning of a wall-paper factory at Buffalo, N. Y., on December 17th, is exceptionally distressing. It was a five-story building, and 150 men and boys were in it when the fire broke out. The inflammable nature of the contents of the factory caused the fire to spread rapidly, so that in less than twenty minutes after the alarm was given the building was a mass of flames. The walls crumbled and fell, and buried probably fifteen of the employes. The doors to the different rooms were hung to swing in, and each had a heavy spring closing it, thereby retarding the egress of the occupants. The building was without fire-escapes of any kind. The terrified workmen took to the windows, and many of them escaped with broken bones and bruised bodies. Those in the upper stories, unable to escape, appeared for a moment at the windows, and then sank back suffocated in the smoke and flames.

Next Saturday and Sunday, Collections will be made in the various places of worship and the business houses in New York in aid of the hospitals of the city. Last year the collections in one hundred and eight places of worship amounted to $15,145.64. Other contributions called out by the occasion raised the sum to $25,430.07. It is hoped that this year even a larger sum will be raised, and that the example of the Empire City may be followed in other cities. In Manchester, England, Hospital Sunday this year resulted in collections amounting to $39,000, and in London to over $150,000.

Public Interest in Foreign Affairs is still concentrated on the grave condition of Ireland. It is undeniable that the nation is on the verge of civil war. The magistrates throughout the country, in replying to a circular of the British Government explaining their duties, say that it is impossible under present conditions to execute the laws. The reports of newspaper correspondents prove that the Land League exercises supreme rule in Ireland. If any of its members are prosecuted by the authorities, the judges, juries, and witnesses are threatened with assassination, and all obnoxious persons are subjected to the process of excommunication called Boycotting. How the government will deal with a situation so serious is not known, and, indeed, there are indications that the Cabinet is divided as to its future policy. One section is said to advocate severe coercive measures, while another section urges the introduction of reform in the land laws and a policy designed to ameliorate the condition of the poor. Grave issues hang on the decision at which they may arrive, and we may hope that, as the Cabinet contains many godly men, many prayers will ascend to the Giver of all wisdom that He will guide them in their difficult path.

The Turkish Government has Appealed to the European Powers against Greece. It invites intervention on the plea that Greece is making vast preparations for war, and offers as the basis of negotiation to surrender a portion of the territory agreed upon by the Berlin Congress. As this territory does not include Janina and two other important cities, Greece refuses to accept the proposal, and it is believed that war is imminent unless the united action of the Great Powers forces Turkey into submission.

Among the Foreign Topics of Interest, is the intelligence that the British troubles in South Africa are again becoming serious owing to the disaffection of the Boers.—The death of Madame Thiers, the widow of the distinguished French statesman, occurred December 12th.—The Marquis of Ripon, the Roman Catholic Peer, appointed by Mr. Gladstone as Governor-General of India, has been seized with serious illness, and is expected in the event of his recovery to resign his appointment.—The French Government is being attacked on all sides. The returned Communists, the Bonapartists, and other sections of political society, agree in denouncing it, while duels and challenges to duels are common among the upper classes of society.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Meetings in San Francisco continue to grow in interest and usefulness. They have been crowded from the first, and now overflow meetings are regularly held. A correspondent of a New York journal writes: "There is, perhaps, no hymn that Sankey sings that so touches the heart as 'Where is my Wandering Boy To-night?' for there are so many wanderers here." The influence of the meetings will extend directly to China, Japan, and the Sandwich Islands, as people are constantly going from San Francisco there, either for business or pleasure. Chinamen also attend the meetings. The Gospel is presented so simply that the Chinese, with but a slight knowledge of our language, can understand enough to save them; many speak excellent English. A summons for a Christian convention, to include the ministers and Christian workers of the Pacific coast, has been issued.

Rev. Thos. Harrison, the Boy Preacher whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 24th, will commence a series of evangelistic services in Indianapolis on January 2d.

Bible and Prayer Union.—The Lessons for the ensuing week are the consecutive Psalms, that for to-morrow, Dec. 24, being Psalm 144. The following requests for prayer have been received: For a minister suffering from an affection of the eye, that he may be restored to health and usefulness if God will.—From a subscriber in Maine for the restoration to health of his invalid wife.—By a lonely widow woman in Georgia for the conversion of a brother, a backslider.—From a minister in Ohio that his church may increase in spirituality, and that he may be endued with the power of the Spirit, and God glorified, and souls saved.—From a subscriber who has been ill and is out of employment, and who has a wife and four children depending on him, that his way may be made plain and his affliction blessed to his soul.—From the father of a large family that his children might be converted and kept from falling under the power of intoxicating liquors.—From a Christian whose brother was once a zealous preacher, but who has now become a sceptic, that the Saviour would follow his straying sheep and bring him back to his fold.—For a minister who is becoming worldly-minded.—For a son who has wandered from God.—For a poor Christian who has been blind for eleven years.—From a mother in distress about her son, who has hitherto borne an irreproachable character, but who recently imbibed sceptical opinions, and suddenly left his family, now in ignorance of his whereabouts; that God would follow him and convince him of his sin and restore him.

A Police Court Case tried in New York on December 9th should be a warning to families living in rural districts. A woman was placed in the dock charged with keeping a disreputable house in this city. The facts were brought to light through the evidence of a girl discovered there, who came from White Mills, Pa. A young man had induced ner to come to New York to obtain employment, and had then conducted her to the house in question and had received five dollars from the proprietor as his fee. The girl's father became alarmed at not hearing from her, and sent her photograph to the police. A thorough search was made of the city, and the girl was found and returned to her home. She had been kept a close prisoner and subjected o ill-treatment.

Fifty Million Worms in the Muscles of a Livng man was the diagnosis two physicians made of he case of a patient in Bellevue Hospital last veek. The man was a butcher nineteen years of ge who obtained admission to the hospital to be reated for rheumatism from which he was supposed to be suffering. As the ordinary symptoms f that disease were not apparent, a careful examnation of the patient was made, and ultimately a mall portion of muscle was extracted from his houlder and placed under a microscope. It was ound to be full of the worms called Trichinæ, and he disease had been contracted by eating small ortions of raw diseased meat. Medical treatment ailed to effect a cure, and the patient died from xhaustion on December 6th. A post mortem exmination by the two professors revealed the fact hat over fifty millions of these minute creatures ad existed in the body of the miserable man. The ase, which is extremely rare, recalls that menioned in Acts 12 : 23.

Some Years Ago a Group of Students Stood onversing in the recreation grounds of Penningon Seminary. Among them was a lad of sixeen, of pleasant, but feminine features, spoiled om early childhood by over-indulgence. Drinkg was the subject of conversation in the group. ne of the young men, now the Rev. E. A. Day, eely expressed himself in reprobation of the abit, and said he never drank. "Do you never ink?" inquired the other youth. "Never," said r. Day, "have I drank a glass of liquor in my e." The other's lip curled with ineffable scorn he replied, "Why it has been three years since began to drink fashionable drinks of brandy"; d he walked away in disgust. A few years lar a cloud as black as midnight fell upon a New rsey home. That young man, the son of doting rents, who loved their boy well but not wisely, as picked up in the streets of Philadelphia, dead, victim of drink.

A Small Boy, Ten Years of Age, has Begun ork in earnest as a preacher, in Greenville, N. J., ving fitted up part of a chicken-house for the rpose. An old wagon serves him for a pulpit. number of young neighbors gather there and ten to the exhortations from their youthful comnion. Before dismissing his juvenile congregan, the boy calls their attention to some Bible exacts, a portion of the Sermon on the Mount, or e of the commandments, and requests them to ink over the subject during the week. At the se of the meeting he tries to answer questions ich may be asked in relation to the Bible. He s a regular and deeply interested attendant at a ies of meetings held in the Reformed Church in eenville some weeks ago. Since then he has en a studious reader. He entered on his work th the remark that he wanted to see if he could t do some good in the world.

Thora's Death in Paris.—"So Beautiful to here!" were the words of a dying girl on being ought to "the Home" in Paris established by ss Leigh. Some three years ago she was one of inmates, when the earnestness with which she ened at the Bible readings, and the eagerness h which every opportunity was sought of attend- them, marked her as one who was seeking to Jesus. Had she now any fear? No; the ment of death would be the most longed for of in her life—"to be present with the Lord," l the ghastly features relaxed and lighted up with a beautiful smile as she anticipated that glorious transition! She expressed a wish to receive the Lord's Supper, which was administered. The scalding tongue was put out, that drops of water might slake the consuming fire within. "I would like to drink, but I dare not; never mind, I'll try and bear it: soon I shall be with Jesus, and the fountains of living waters." At last death came. A few minutes before she breathed her last, she asked, "Is this the end? Is it all over now?" On her sister answering, "I think so," she added, with great emphasis, "Thank God!" Turning her head as if to sleep, she passed away.

Dream of a Preacher's Success.—In a Recent address in London, Mr. Reginald Radcliffe, an Evangelistic preacher, said: "Some twenty years ago I was preaching in Scotland. I dreamed that an uneducated and illiterate man came to the same town to preach along with me; and I saw in my dream that the crowds were leaving me and going across to him, until his congregation became an immense multitude, and my congregation dwindled away. In the dream I had his name given to me. Immediately afterward—I do not know whether it was the very next day—an illiterate man did come to me in Edinburgh, whom I knew well, and whose name was the same as I dreamed about. I was preaching and he came to preach, too. I had had crowds before he began, according to my dream, and it was literally fulfilled. They speedily left me and went to my friend, until at last there was no place in the city to contain the crowds who flocked to hear him, and he spoke to them on the Calton hill."

An Incident in Church.—An Amusing Incident took place recently at St. Clement's Church, Manchester, England. The Rev. D. Ellison preached the anniversary sermon, and specially addressed the young on the importance of a thorough and honest devotion to duty. He illustrated his subject by an anecdote of a railway pointsman whose duty it was to turn an approaching train on to a certain line of rails, but who saw his own child playing where the train would run. Mr. Ellison graphically pictured the momentary struggle and the inevitable catastrophe, and asked how it was possible for the child to avoid his fate, what must he do? A youth in the congregation, some ten or eleven years of age, wrought up to the highest pitch of interest by the story, cried out, "Lie down." "And he did lie down," said the preacher, "and was saved."

The Bishop of Caledonia, writing to his British friends, in June last, on board a canoe on the Skeena River, British Columbia, says: "My hearers have been sailors, traders, loafers, miners, Greeks, Germans, and Norwegians; French, Maltese, and Britons; Russians, Kanakas, and Americans; Chinese and Canadians; Jews and Gentiles; Caucasians, Semites, and Mongolians; Indians of the salt water, and fresh-water Indians; hunters, fishers, packers, and nondescripts; roundheads, flatheads, and peaked heads, all beautifully supplied with hair as black as jet, sometimes short and clean, sometimes foul, greased, and matted. I have preached on the beach and on shipboard in the miner's cabin and the trader's log; in the Indian branch-built hunting lodge, and his larger but less agreeable village home, where the smoke fails to subdue the pervading ill-odor; also amid the tangled forest on the coast, and clouds of mosquitoes on the prairie. My churches have been decorated in season and out of season, but have had neither pulpit nor prayer-desk, belfry nor organ. The care of nature called for no help or scrutiny from archdeacon or rural dean, churchwarden or verger. And oh, the joy of it! There have been no church expenses, no collections or painful pleadings for subscriptions."

A Temperance Regulation has been Adopted by the Old Colony Railroad Company which should be incorporated in the rules of every other company. At the last general meeting the directors decided that in future no subordinate shall be employed on the line who is not a total abstainer from intoxicating liquor. So many accidents have resulted from the carelessness of railroad employees that the suspicion is aroused that drinking habits may account for many of them.

THE LAMENTATIONS OF JESUS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"When he was come near, he beheld the city, and wept over it."—Luke 19 : 41.

The Three Occasions when Jesus Wept—The Sovereign of Sorrow—I. Our Lord's Inward Grief—1. Too Intense to be Restrained by the Occasion—2. It Overmastered Natural Feeling—Admiration—Sympathy—3. It Reveals His Nature—His Great Tenderness—God's very Heart—4. His Grief an Encouragement—5. An Admonishment to Workers—6. Instruction to Seekers—II. Our Lord's Verbal Lamentations—1. Their Fault, Ignorance—2. The Bliss Lost, Peace—3. The Persons who where Losers, even thou—4. Neglected Opportunities—5. The Spiritual Blindness—6. Approaching Ruin—The Tragedy According to Josephus—The Death of a Soul—Two Words in Contrast—A Brighter Light.

On three occasions we are told that Jesus wept. You know them well, but it may be worth while to refresh your memories. The first was when our Lord was about to raise Lazarus from the dead. He saw the sorrow of the sisters, He meditated upon the fruit of sin in the death and corruption of the body, and He groaned in spirit, and it is written that "Jesus wept." Those who divided the chapters did well to make a separate verse of that simple sentence. It stands alone, the smallest and yet in some respects the greatest verse in the whole Bible. It shines as a diamond of the first water. It contains a world of healing balm condensed into a drop. Here we have much in little: a wealth of meaning in two words.

The second occasion we have before us, and we will make it the theme of our discourse: at the sight of the beloved but rebellious city Jesus wept. The third occasion is mentioned by the Apostle Paul in the fifth chapter of his Epistle to the Hebrews, where he tells us what else we might not have known, that the Saviour "in the days of His flesh, offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save Him from death, and was heard in that He feared." That passage relates to the Gethsemane agony, in which a shower of bitter tears was mingled with the bloody sweat. The strength of His love strove with the anguish of His soul, and in the process forced forth the sacred waters of His eyes.

We will now turn to this second instance of our Saviour's weeping, and here we find, when we look at the original word, that it is not exactly expressed by the word used in our admirable English version. We there read, "He beheld the city, and wept over it;" but the Greek means a great deal more than tears, and includes sobbings and cries. Perhaps it may be best to read it, "He lamented over it." He suffered a deep inward anguish, and He expressed it by signs of woe, and by words which showed how bitter was His grief. Jesus is here a king by general acclamation, but king of grief by personal lamentation. He is the sovereign of sorrow, weeping while riding in triumph in the midst of His followers. Looked He ever more kingly than when He showed the tenderness of His heart toward His rebellious subjects? The city which had been the metropolis of the house of David never saw so truly royal a man before; for He is fittest to rule who is readiest to sympathize.

I. First, contemplate

OUR LORD'S INWARD GRIEF.

1. We note concerning it that it was so intense that it could not be restrained by the occasion. The occasion was one entirely by itself: a brief gleam of sunlight in a cloudy day, a glimpse of summer amid a cruel winter. His disciples had brought the colt and had placed Him thereon, and He was riding to the city, which was altogether moved at His coming. The multitudes were eager to do Him homage with waving boughs and loud hosannas, while His disciples in the inner circle were exulting in songs of praise which almost emulated the angelic chorales of His birth night. "Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth, good-will toward men," found its echo when the disciples said, "Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord: peace in heaven, and glory in the highest." Yet amid the hosannas of the multitude, while the palm branches were yet in many hands, the Saviour stopped to weep; on the very spot where David had gone centuries before weeping, the Son of David stayed awhile to look upon the city, and to pour out His lamentation.

That must have been deep grief which ran counter to all the demands of the season, and violated, as it were, all the decorum of the occasion, turning a festival into a mourning, a triumph into a lament. Ah! He knew the hollowness of all the praises which were ringing in his ears; He knew that they who shouted hosanna to-day would, ere many suns had risen, cry, "Crucify Him! crucify Him!" He knew that His joyous entrance into Jerusalem would be followed by a mournful procession out of it, when they would take Him to the cross that He might die.

See, then, your Lord surrounded, as it were, with billows of praise in the midst of a tumultuous sea of exultation, Himself standing as a lone rock, unmoved by all the excitement around Him. Deep was the grief which could not be concealed or controlled on such a day, when the sincere congratulations of His disciples, the happy songs of children, and the loud hosannahs of the multitude everywhere welcomed Him.

2. The greatness of His grief may be seen, again, by the fact that it overmastered other very natural feelings which might have been, and perhaps were, excited by the occasion. Our Lord stood on the brow of the hill where He could see Jerusalem before Him in all its beauty. What thoughts it awakened in Him! His memory was stronger and quicker than ours, for His mental powers were unimpaired by sin, and He could remember all the great and glorious things which had been spoken of Zion, the city of God. Yet, as He remembered them all, no joy came into His soul because of the victories of David or the pomp of Solomon; temple and tower had lost all charm for Him; "the joy of the earth" brought no joy to Him, but at the sight of the venerable city and its holy and beautiful house He wept.

Modern travellers who have any soul in them are always moved by

from the Mount of Olives. Dean Stanley wrote, "Nothing at Rome, Memphis, Thebes, Constantinople, or Athens can approach it in beauty or interest;" and yet this is the poor, mean Jerusalem of modern times, by no means to be compared with the Jerusalem of our Saviour's day. Yet the Lord Jesus says nothing about this city, "Beautiful for situation," except to lament over it. If He counts the towers thereof, and marks well her bulwarks, it is only to bemoan their total overthrow. All the memories of the past did but swell the torrent of His anguish in the foresight of the doom.

Something of admiration may have entered the Saviour's holy breast; for before Him stood His Father's house, of which He still thought so much, that even though He knew it would be left desolate, yet He took pains to purge it once again of the buyers and sellers who polluted it. That temple was built of white marble; much of it, the roof especially, covered with slabs of gold. It must have been one of the fairest objects that ever human eye rested upon as it glittered in the sun before Him. But what were those great and costly stones? what were those curious carvings to Him? His heart was saying within itself, "There shall not be one stone left upon another that shall not be thrown down." His sadness at the foresight of the city's desolation mastered His natural feeling of admiration for its present glory. His sorrow found no alleviation either in the past or the present of the city's history; the dreadful future threw a pall over all.

More striking still is the fact that His grief for others prevented all apprehension for Himself. As He beheld that city, knowing that within a week He would die outside its gates, He might naturally have begun to feel the shadow of His sufferings, but no trace of such emotion is discoverable. You and I in such a case, with the certainty of a speedy and ignominious death before us, would have been heavy about it; but Jesus was not. In all that flood of tears, there was not one for His own death; the tears were all for Jerusalem's doom, even as He said afterward, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but for yourselves and for your children." It is not, "Woe is me, the holy city will become an Aceldama, a field of blood by my slaughter," but, "Oh, if thou hadst known, even thou, in this thy day."

HE GRIEVES FOR OTHERS,

not for Himself; yet it must have been a very intense emotion which thus swept away, as with a torrent, everything else, so that He had neither joy for joy nor sorrow for sorrow, but His whole strength of feeling was poured forth from one sluice, and ran in one channel toward the devoted city which had rejected Him, and was about to put Him to death.

3. This great sorrow of His reveals to us the nature of our Lord. How complex is the person of Christ! He foresaw that the city would be destroyed, and though He was divine He wept. He knew every single event and detail of the dreadful tragedy, and used words about it of special historical accuracy which bring out His prophetic character, and yet the eye so clear in seeing the future was almost blinded with tears. He speaks of Himself as willing and able to have averted this doom by gathering the guilty ones under His wing, and thus He intimates His Godhead.

I believe it is the Christ, the entire Christ, that both foretells the doom of Jerusalem and laments it. Some have even been staggered at the statement that Jesus wept. Certain of the early Christians, I am sorry to say, even went the length of striking the passage out of the Gospel, because they thought that weeping would dishonor their Lord. They ought to have had more reverence for the inspired word, and a truer knowledge of their Master, and never to have wished to obliterate a record which reflects the highest honor upon man's Redeemer.

Our Lord's lament gives us an insight into the great tenderness of His character; He is so tender that He not only weeps while weeping is of any avail, but He laments when lamentation must be fruitless. He reminds me of a judge who, having aforetime been a friend, warning, perusading, pleading with the prisoner, at last has the unutterable pain of condemning Him; He puts on the black cap, and, with many a sigh and tear, pronounces sentence, feeling the dreadful nature of the occasion far more than the criminal at the bar. He is overcome with emotion while He declares that the condemned must be taken to the place from whence He came, and there die a felon's death. Oh, the tender heart of Christ, that when it comes to pronouncing the inevitable sentence, "Your house is left unto you desolate," yet He cannot utter the righteous word without lamentation.

In this our Lord reveals the very heart of God. Did He not say, "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father"? Here, then, you see the Father Himself, even He who said of old, "As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live." The doom must be pronounced, for infinite justice demands it, but mercy laments what she was not permitted to prevent.

4. For a practical lesson we may remark that this weeping of the Saviour should much encourage men to trust Him. Those who desire His salvation may approach Him without hesitation, for His tears prove His hearty desires for our good. When a man who is not given to sentimental tears, as some effeminate beings are, is seen to weep, we are convinced of His sincerity. When a strong man is passionately convulsed from head to foot, and pours out lamentations, you feel that He is in downright earnest, and if that earnestness be manifested on your behalf you can commit yourself to Him. Oh, weeping sinner, fear not to come to a weeping Saviour! If you will not come to Jesus it grieves Him; that you have not come long ago has wrung His heart; that you are still away from Him is His daily sorrow; come, then, to Him without delay.

5. This, too, I think is an

ADMONISHMENT TO CHRISTIAN WORKERS.

Some of us long ago came to Jesus, and we now occupy ourselves with endeavoring to bring others to Him; in this blessed work our Lord instructs us by His example. Brothers and sisters, if we would have others come to Jesus, we must be like Jesus in tenderness: we must be meek, lowly, gentle, and sympathetic, and we must be moved to deep emotion at the thought that any should perish. Never let us speak of the doom of the wicked harshly, flippantly, or without holy grief; the loss of heaven and the endurance of hell must always be themes for tears.

6. Let me add that I think the lament of Jesus should instruct all those who would now come to Him as to the manner of their approach. While I appealed to you just now, were there any who said, "I would fain come to Jesus, but how shall I come?" The answer is, come with sorrow and with prayer, even as it is written, "They shall come with weeping, and with supplications will I lead them." As Jesus meets you, so meet Him. He shows you in what fashion to return, in what array to draw near to your Redeemer, for He comes to you clothed in no robes but those of mourning, adorned with no jewels but the pearls of His tears.

Come to Him in the garments of humiliation, mourning for your sin. "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted." Penitential sorrow worketh life in men. Only come to Jesus and tell Him you have sinned, and are ashamed, and fain would cease to do evil, and learn to do well.

God bless these feeble words concerning the inner emotions of my Lord, and may the Holy Spirit again rest upon us while we further pursue the subject into another field.

II. We are now to consider

OUR LORD'S VERBAL LAMENTATIONS.

These are recorded in the following words: "Oh, that thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong unto thy peace! but now they are hid from thine eyes."

1. First, notice, He laments over the fault by which they perished—"Oh, that thou hadst known." Ignorance, wilful ignorance, was their ruin. "Oh, that thou hadst known." They did not know what they might have known, what they ought to have known: they did not know their God. "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib, but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider." They knew not God, they knew not God's only Son, they knew not Him who came in mercy to them with nothing but love upon His lips. Oh, but this is the pity, that light is come into the world, and men will not have it, but love darkness rather than light.

2. The Lord laments the bliss which they had lost, the peace which could not be theirs. "Oh, that thou hadst known the things that belong unto thy peace." The name of that city was, as we know, Jerusalem, which being interpreted signifies a vision of peace. They that looked upon it saw before them a vision of peace. But, alas, Jerusalem had lost its "salem," or peace, and become a vision only, because she did not know and would not know her God. Oh, men and women that know not God, you have lost peace; even now you are like the troubled sea that cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. "There is no peace, saith my God, unto the wicked." Oh, what joys you might have had! The delights of pardoned sin, the bliss of conscious safety, the joy of communion with God, the rapture of fellowship with Christ Jesus, the heavenly expectation of infinite glory, all might have been yours; but you have put them away from you.

You are losers, you are awful losers by not being reconciled to God, and you will be worse losers yet, for that false peace which now stands you in the stead of true peace, and beguiles and fascinates you, will depart like the mirage of the desert, and leave you on the arid sands of despair, to seek for rest and find it not.

3. But our Lord also lamented over the persons who had lost peace. Observe that He says, "Oh, that thou hadst known, even thou. Thou art Jerusalem, the favored city. It is little that Egypt did not know, that Tyre and Sidon did not know, but that thou shouldst not know!" Ah, friends, if Jesus were here this morning, He might weep over some of you and say, "Oh, that thou hadst known, even thou."

YOU WERE A LOVELY CHILD !

Even in your earliest days you were fond of everything good ; you were taken to the place of worship and sat on your mother's knee, pleased to be there. Do you remember the minister's name that you used to lisp with delight, the texts you repeated, and the hymns you sang? You grew up to be a lad right full of promise, and all felt sure that you would be a Christian. What exhortations your father, who is now in heaven, gave you! And she that bare you and loved you till she passed away, how she prayed and pleaded for you!

Some of you have been sitting here, or in some other place where Christ is preached, for a very long time, and you have often been very near to the kingdom, and yet you are not in it. You have come right up to the edge of the border-land, but you have not crossed the line. You are not far from the kingdom of God, but you lack one thing —the one essential point of decision for Christ. "Oh, that thou hadst known, even thou!" You are always ready to help the cause of God with your purse, for you take an interest in every good work, you cannot bear blasphemy or infidelity ; and yet you are not saved. There are a thousand things that are hopeful about you, but there is one thing which damps our hope, for you always procrastinate, and know not how to use your present opportunity.

Jesus bids you use "this thy day," but you linger and delay. To-day is God's accepted time ; postpone no longer the hour of decision. Alas, that thou shouldst perish! Shall the child of such a mother be lost? Shall the son of such a father be driven down to hell? I cannot bear it. God have mercy on you, sons and daughters of Christian parents! You that have been enriched with Christian privileges, why will ye die? Young man, so promising but yet so undecided, it makes the Saviour Himself weep that thou, even thou, shouldst still refuse to know the things that make for thy peace.

4. Our Lord wept because of the opportunity which they had neglected. He said, "At least in this thy day." It was such a favored day : they aforetime had been warned by holy men, but now they had the Son of God Himself to preach to them. It was a day of miracles of mercy, a day of the unveiling of gospel grace ; and yet they would not have Christ, though He had come so near to them, and it was a day of merciful visitation such as other nations had not known.

Perhaps to-day also may be a day of visitation to some of you. Shall we have to lament, "Oh that thou hadst known, even thou, at least in this thy day"—in this Sabbath day, this day of power, this day of the Spirit. Oh, now you weep, and I perceive you feel some tender touches of the Spirit's power ; do not resist him, and cause this day also to pass away unimproved. "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and you are not saved ;" and has the autumn closed, and shall the winter come and go, and shall these days in which the Spirit visits men all depart till God shall declare that it does not become the dignity of His Spirit always to strive with flesh, and therefore He shall cease His operations and leave men to their own devices?

5. The Lord Jesus mourned again because He saw the blindness which had stolen over them. They had shut their eyes so fast that now they could not see ; their ears which they had stopped had become dull and heavy ; their hearts which they had hardened had waxen gross ; so that they could not see with their eyes, nor hear with their ears, nor feel in their hearts, nor be converted that he should heal them. Why, the truth was as plain as the sun in the heavens, and yet they could not see it ; and so is the gospel at this hour to many of you, and yet you perceive it not.

6. Lastly, we know that the great floodgates of Christ's grief were pulled up because of the ruin which he foresaw. It is worth any man's while to read the story of the destruction of Jerusalem, as it is told by Josephus ; it is the most harrowing of all records written by human pen ; it remains there never was and there never will be anything comparable to it ; the people died of famine and of pestilence, and fell by thousands beneath the swords of their own countrymen. Women devoured the flesh of their own children, and men raged against each other with the fury of wild beasts. All ills seemed to meet in that doomed city ; it was filled within with horrors and surrounded without by terrors. Portents amazed the sky both day and night. There was no escape, neither would the frenzied people accept of mercy. The city itself was the banqueting hall of death.

Josephus says : "All hope of escaping was now cut off from the Jews, together with their liberty of going out of the city. Then did the famine widen its progress, and devour the people by whole houses and families ; the upper rooms were full of women and infants that were dying by famine, and the lanes of the city were full of the dead bodies of the aged ; the children also, and the young men wandered about the market-places like shadows, all swelled with the famine, and fell down dead wheresoever their misery seized them. For a time the dead were buried ; but afterward, when they could not do that, they had them cast down from the wall into the valleys beneath. When Titus, on going his rounds along these valleys, saw them full of dead bodies, and the thick putrefaction running about them, he gave a groan, and spreading out his hands to heaven, called God to witness this was not his doing."

There is nothing in history to exceed this horror, but even this is nothing compared with the destruction of a soul. A man might look with complacency upon a dying body if he knew that within it was a soul that would live eternally in bliss and cause the body to rise again to equal joy ; but for a soul to die is a catastrophe so terrible that the heavens might be clothed with sackcloth for its funeral. There is a death which never ends, the separation of the soul from God, which is the completest of all deaths. The separation of the soul from the body is but, as it were, a prelude and type of the far more dreadful death, the separation of the soul from God.

BANISHED FROM HOPE,

Existing but not living, and that forever ; what a condition must this be!

I shall draw no picture : words fail ; but oh, my hearers, shall it be that any one among you shall ever know the meaning of the Saviour's words : "These shall go away into everlasting punishment"? Will it ever be your lot to hear Him say —you who hear me this day, I mean—"Depart, ye cursed, into everlasting fire in hell, prepared for the devil and his angels?" If we could mark any here to whom this doom will happen, we might make a ring around them and bear them home, rending our garments and tearing our hair ; for it would be a far greater grief than if we knew that they would die by the sword or by famine in a foreign land. All ills are trifles compared with the second death.

Just a moment, while in conclusion I set forth our Saviour's grief, as it expressed itself in other words ; for those other words may help us to fresh light. You remember the passage in the twenty-third of Matthew, which I read in your hearing, where the Lord said, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" Do you see his grace and grief? These people killed the prophets, and yet the Lord of prophets would have gathered them. His love had gone so far that even prophet-killers He would have gathered.

Is not this wonderful that there should be grace enough in Christ to gather adulterers, thieves, liars, and to forgive and change them, and yet they will not be gathered? That He should be willing even to gather such base ones into a place of salvation, and yet should be refused? The pith of it lies in this : "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not."

See, here the case stands thus : I would, but ye would not. This is a grief to love. If it had been a fact that Christ would not, then I could not understand His tears ; but when He says, "I would, but ye would not then," I see the deep reason of His anguish. The failure of will is in you that perish, not in Christ who cries, "I would, but ye would not." Ay, and He adds, "How often would I." Not once was He in a merciful mood, and pitiful to sinners for that time alone, but He cries, "How often would I have gathered." Here is a painful sentence. Set the

TWO WORDS IN CONTRAST :

"Gathered," that is what you might have been ; "desolate," that is what you shall be ; and Jesus weeps because of it. "Gathered"—it is such a beautiful picture ; you see the little chicks fleeing from danger, when they hear the cluck of the mother hen ; they gather together and they come under her wings. Did you ever hear that little, pretty cry they make when they are all together, with their heads buried in the feathers? How warm and comfortable they are! This is where you might have been, gathered under the warm breast of the eternal God, feeling His love with the rest of the people, joying and rejoicing in a communion of complete security ; but inasmuch as you would not be gathered, see what you will be, "desolate," without a friend, without a helper. Desolate! Desolate! Desolate! Because you would not be gathered! Well doth the tender Saviour weep over men since they will perversely choose such a doom.

I do not feel as if I could close in gloom ; I must flash before you though it be for the last minute. The day hastens on when Christ will come a second time, and then He shall behold a new Jerusalem, a spiritual Jerusalem, builded by divine hands. The foundations thereof are of jewels, and the gates thereof are of pearl. How He will rejoice over it! He shall rest in His love, He shall rejoice over it with singing. He will shed no tears then, but He will see in the Jerusalem from above the travail of His soul, and He shall be satisfied. When Zion shall be built up the Lord shall appear in His glory, and the marriage of the Lamb will have come. Meanwhile, if any one of you who are not yet saved will come to Jesus, He will rejoice over you, for He takes pleasure in the stones of Zion, and favoreth the dust thereof, and if you are as little as Zion's dust and as mean as her rubbish, He will rejoice over you.

It is written that "There is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth." Now, angels stand in the presence of the Lord Jesus, and there is joy in His heart over a single penitent. If only one sinner shall repent because of this sermon, my Lord will rejoice over him. I, His servant, am, in my measure, intensely glad when a soul repents, but he shall have the chief joy, for His is the chief love. Who will now come to Jesus? Would God it might be the beloved son of a godly mother! Would God it might be you, my long-hesitating hearer, for years a hearer but not a doer of the word. May the Holy Spirit decide you at this very moment.

By a London Clergyman.

UNCLE ROBERT'S HAMPER.

CHAPTER II.

"I HAD only got up to the next floor, "said Mr. Grex,"when a great noise of scuffling and swearing reached my ears. There seemed to be some terrible struggle going on. Fearing lest some injury might be done, I made haste toward the room from which the sounds proceeded. I saw at a glance that it was a row between husband and wife. He was pursuing her round the room, trying to strike her with a black bottle he held in his hand by the neck. If he had struck her, I fear he would have killed her.

"She seemed less drunk than he, and so easily eluded him. Despairing at last of reaching her, he threw the bottle at her, but happily it fell upon the edge of the bed. They became quiet when they saw me. When I spoke to them they began to accuse each other. It seemed that the quarrel arose from the one consuming more than a fair share of the drink. The room was nearly empty of furniture. Three poor little children were huddled together in one corner of the room, only half clothed, and looking almost starved, trembling in every limb, and weeping most bitterly. And this was their way of spending Christmas. I soon found I could make no impression upon their sodden minds, and left them.

"At last I reached Widow Suggins and delivered into her hands her share of the basket. One thing, however, I kept back—a black bottle.

"Do you know, my dear," continued Mr. Grex, turning to his wife, "all the way back I was lifting up my heart to God in prayer, to show me what I ought to do in this terrible matter? And I think I see my duty now. I put the black bottle on the hearthrug, that in the face of it we might take, this very afternoon, some very decided course.

"Now, wife and children," said Mr. Grex solemnly, "let us remember that all the cruelty and scandal and degradation and sin that I have seen this afternoon came from drinking the contents of a black bottle like that. Can it be a good and healthy thing for men, women, and children who are in good health?"

"No, decidedly," said Mrs. Grex.

"No, no, papa," echoed all the other Grexes, very warmly.

"Now, listen again," continued Mr. Grex; "that it is possible to be happy and well without the drink has been proved to me beyond question. The brightest smiles, the healthiest cheeks, and the most religious hearts I found in a room where there was no black bottle.

"What say you, wife? What say you, children? Shall we give up taking strong drink altogether? shall we become teetotalers?"

A chorus of "Yes" immediately rose. There was not one who hesitated.

There was a pleased look upon Mr. Grex's face when he heard this enthusiastic assent to his proposal. And he capped it all by saying,

"And I say 'yes' too, with all my heart. But," he added quickly, "let us not take this step without asking the Lord's blessing on it."

In a moment they were all on their knees, and the voice of the husband and father was pleading for the poor drunkards, and that they themselves might be kept firm and steadfast, and be enabled to do all in their power to assist the poor needy ones.

The first thing Mr. Grex did when they rose was to take the famous black bottle in one hand, and a poker in the other, and with one smart tap to break its neck.

"May the broken bottle, children, be to us all a picture and a type of what we have this day done. From this day forth we break with the drink."

"But what about Uncle Robert, and his next year's hamper?" said Mrs. Grex. "As sure as next Christmas Eve comes, and Uncle Robert is alive and we too, will another black bottle put in an appearance."

It was a very knotty question indeed, and must be decided somehow or other. At last it was determined that the children should write him a letter, and tell him what they had made up their minds to do in reference to strong drink.

"No time like the present," said Mr. Grex; "go over into the corner, and put your heads together, and see what you can do."

It was a long time before the writing materials were ready, and a much longer time before the letter itself was ready. At last, however, it was finished, and submitted for approval. It ran thus:

"Dear Uncle Robert:

"We thank you ever so much for the beautiful hamper. We hope you won't feel hurt, but we have broken the black bottle; and please don't send any more, as we are not going to like black bottles again. Papa and mamma and all of us have become teetotalers. You won't feel hurt, will you, please, dear Uncle Robert?

"With very kind love,
"Your affectionate
"Nieces & Nephews."

Mr. Grex having provided the stamp, the letter was directed, and sent off that very day.

Do you think the Grexes were less happy the latter part of that day than they were at the beginning? Were their smiles less beaming and their laughter less hearty? Nobody ever noticed it. And to tell the truth, nobody could have noticed it, because as a matter of fact, instead of damping their feelings, the step they had taken brightened them considerably. Unselfishness ever brings its own reward. Even the smallest Grex of all had such a warm, cosey feeling about the heart that she couldn't help referring to it, and wondering where it came from. Indeed, they all felt so very comfortable that there was a general regret expressed that they had not taken the step long ago.

One incident which happened a little later on in the day gave such an increase to their joy that I cannot refrain from mentioning it. It seems that the news had reached the kitchen, and had raised quite a lively discussion there. From what Mrs. Grex was told after, the information as to the revolution up-stairs was brought when they were in the very act of consuming a bottle of wine—their Christmas treat.

"Master and mistress turned teetotalers!" they all exclaimed; "who'd have thought it?"

The news so affected them all that, when they lifted the glass again to their lips and sipped, the wine had quite changed its taste. It wasn't half so nice. Somehow it had got to be quite unpalatable; and then they all became quite quiet. Nobody spoke for full five minutes. At length the silence became so painful that it was plain somebody must break it.

Said the cook, "I don't enjoy this wine a bit now." And so said the rest.

Said the cook again, "I think I won't take any more."

"Nor I either," responded the others. The cook then solemnly corked the bottle and pushed it to the farther end of the table.

"If master and mistress," they said, "can do without it, why can't we?"

You know now what it was that increased the happiness of the already happy Grexes. The kitchen had followed the parlor, and had become teetotalers too.

It was wonderful how smoothly everything went after this step. Tempers were sweetened, hours were more regular, advice was more readily received, and the kitchen, instead of being a thorn in Mrs. Grex's side, was all that could be desired. There was not a brighter, happier household in all Beveril than that of the Grexes. And this was not all. It extended to other households too. Friends who came to the house carried away the infection with them, and became centres of influence themselves. And to add one more fact before I resume the thread of my story, it was remarked that not a single household who had followed the Grexes in their change of habits ever repented and returned again to the use of strong drink.

Though Uncle Robert wrote many times to the children during the next year, he never referred to their letter. It was the next Christmas Eve that his reply came.

The hamper arrived as usual, and as usual was opened in the presence of the whole family. The first thing which met their eye was a black bottle of the very same shape, and labelled in the very same way, as that of last Christmas.

"It's too bad of Uncle Robert to send us a horrid old bottle again, cried out the little Grexes, one and all.

"It feels very light," said Mrs. Grex, weighing it in her hand; let us open it."

When it was opened it was found to be empty as regarded wine. The only thing it contained was a slip of paper, on which these words were written:

"Uncle Robert has joined his little nieces and nephews, and his brother and sister, in giving up strong drink. A happy Christmas to you all, and no black bottles."

EPHRAIM FORD'S NIGHT-WATCH.

Thinking Over his Past Life on Good Friday Night, Ephraim Discovers How it it could be Forgiven—He is Converted, and Becomes a Useful Missionary.

It was the night of Good Friday, fine and clear, and the grim, defiant outlines of the citadel of Gibraltar loomed up majestically. Nothing disturbed the stillness of that midnight hour save the measured tread of each sentry and the occasional challenging of the officer of the night as he went his rounds to see that each sentinel was at his proper post. Good Friday was almost gone. In another quarter of an hour the chimes of the clock-towers would ring out the hour of twelve. That Good Friday had been full of services of one kind and another, and Ephraim Ford had strolled from place to place, seeing in these services only matter for "fun." But now that he stood alone under the midnight sky, or paced his solitary beat, memory began to recall other scenes and other times. He could remember, very distinctly, the parents, in the midst of their little family group; the girls, with their quiet, maidenly winsomeness; and the boys, of whom he was the roughest and noisiest, perhaps—full of fun, daring, and tricks.

And there was another recollection which seemed to strike him hardest of all. In those days of long ago, Ephraim had, along with his brothers, sisters, and playfellows, attended a Sunday-school; and the anniversaries of the Sunday-school were held on each recurring Easter Sunday. These anniversary meetings were still kept up—at least, so his sister told him in her letters; and while he had turned out "wild" and headstrong—finishing up a course of folly with enlistment into a regiment bound for foreign service—some of the lads who had been his class-fellows had become useful men. Half a dozen or more had taken the posts of the former teachers in that very Sunday-school, while two or three more were preaching the Gospel, either in their own or in foreign lands. And as Ephraim recalled all these particulars, he grew nervous and spellbound, as it were.

Such seasons come sometimes in a man's life. The voice of conscience, unfettered at last, speaks loudly of a past which is full of sin, of privileges despised rather than improved, and of offences committed against the light of God's Word. Then, too, frequently the still small voice of God's Spirit speaks, and the sinner is drawn toward his only remedy.

This was how it happened with Ephraim Ford. Somehow—he could not tell how—the memory of the last anniversary at which he ever attended rose up before him. Fresh as yesterday, rose up before his mental vision the picture of the gray-haired preacher announcing as his text the glorious words, "Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification" How full of sin and unhallowed pleasure had the four years been which had succeeded that service; and in all those intervening years he had given small thought to any of these things; yet they rose in his mind as if he had listened to them only that very day. What could it mean?

"Pshaw! I think I'm getting nervous!" said he to himself; and shouldering his musket he paced more vigorously to and fro, as if he would fain banish all serious thought. But a man's thoughts stick close to him. Outward voices may be silenced, but the inward monitor speaks more loudly in solitude. So his pacing to and fro only served to make his mind more active.

"I shouldn't wonder if the old folks at home ain't praying for their soldier-son! I know they think great things of their anniversary day, and maybe when they hear other folks talk about it, they think about me." Thus his soliloquy went on, for Ephraim Ford was as yet far from being hardened, and some of these recollections cut him to the quick.

"Can't think what's come to me to-night!" he soliloquized again. "Why, it all comes up so fresh that I'm sure they must be praying for me at home. That's the secret! What a queer text, 'Delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification!' That old preacher is dead and gone, but I don't forget his text. My offences! My offences! This is the day on which Christ died for my offences! Ah, I wish I were a boy again in that Sunday-school! I hadn't half as many sins to answer for then as I have now. It wouldn't have been half so hard to repent then as it is now. That's what my old teacher used to tell me. I don't know what he would say now, if he knew all! Ah, but God knows all!"

He stopped, and in his ignorance he tried to pray. It was the first prayer which he had offered since his entering the service; and he stumbled and stammered over it, like a child just learning to talk. And this was what he said: "My offences, Lord, are dreadful—so many that I cannot number them. Oh, Lord, forgive. How shall I be forgiven? I've wandered away from the teaching of my youth—from my pious father's prayers; and I have sinned against Thee. Is there nothing that can blot out my sins?"

Footsteps in the distance! Instantly, the soldier's senses were on the alert. Seizing his musket more tightly, he advanced and called out, "Who goes there? Advance, and give the password!"

"Behold the Lamb of God," replied the soldier who came up. Then, recovering himself immediately, he added, with some confusion, "I beg pardon. Those words slipped out. They were in my mind as I came up, so I unconsciously gave them. The password is 'Bravery.'"

"Right! You may pass on. Where do you go?"

"To relieve guard at the east fort." He passed on, and was soon lost to sight.

"Behold the Lamb of God," Ephraim Ford soliloquized again. "Why, that is the very thing that I want. I know the whole verse runs thus, 'Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world.' I used to say it in Sunday-school. That will suffice to blot out my sins. That's the meaning of Christ's death on the cross. He died there for me! I remember it all now. I remember, too, another text—'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin.' How well I recollect learning that as a boy! Why, it all comes up so fresh now. 'Cleanseth us from all sin!' That's what I want. Indeed, my life and my conscience too has been stained over and over again with sin. I know that there are a great many offences down against me in the regimental black-book; but that is nothing to God's Book. Nothing but this can wash out my sins, I know. I think I understand now the meaning of that text, 'Delivered for our offences.' If Jesus had not died, there would have been no chance for me."

At this moment the soldier who was to relieve Ephraim Ford drew near, and the two exchanged places. As Ephraim returned to barracks and turned in for the night, his thoughts still kept him company; and when morning broke he was still pondering anxiously over the questions which the Holy Spirit had suggested. And as the awakened soldier remembered the home of his youth, he tried to pray.

But peace did not come so. On Easter morning Ephraim went eagerly to a place of worship, wondering if some message of mercy would reach him. Two days previously he had strolled with his comrades from place to place, wandering into different haunts in search of sensational performances; now he only sought to hear about Jesus as the Saviour of men, especially of himself. Almost in every church the joyful news of Christ's resurrection was the theme of discourse. Specially was it in the church to which Ephraim went. Strange to say, the text selected for the sermon was that very one which had flashed across Ephraim's mind as being the text of that anniversary Sunday years before, "Who was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification." Ephraim was all attention now. Like cold water to a thirsty soul came the good news of the finished work of Christ for him.

Henceforth all became changed. In place of swearing, drunkenness, and Sabbath-breaking, he became noted for sobriety, prayer, and Bible-reading; while in the room of his bad companions of old times he sought out all the praying men in the regiment and kept company with them. It was not long either before the good news went back to Ephraim Ford's old home; and the feeble, gray-headed parents echoed again the grateful language of the father in the parable: "For this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found."

Ephraim Ford remained in the army for some little time longer; but God in His providence had designed better things for him. His regiment being ordered to Ceylon, he engaged shortly after in missionary work, and became so useful among the natives that special efforts were made to obtain his discharge. That point being gained, he received an appointment as missionary laborer among the Cingalese, and worked in their midst for several years with great acceptance. Finally, after translating the Bible into the Cingalese language, he laid down both life and labor, and entered the heavenly rest. Yet Ephraim Ford won many a heathen to the cross during his lifetime; and how many more, by means of his translation of the Bible, found Jesus, only the records of eternity will tell.

Now the truth which was the ground of hope to the soldier may be also the ground of joyful hope to us. The resurrection of Christ is a solemn verity. If He rose not, neither shall we. If He rose not, our hope is also vain, for we are yet in our sins. But He triumphed over death, and ascending up on high pleads for us before His Father's throne. Having risen, He became our Mediator and prevailing Advocate; and by Him "we are justified from all things," from which we "could not be justified by the law of Moses."

The Tower of Repentance.—In the neighborhood of Hoddam Castle, Dumfrieshire, Scotland, there was once a tower called the "Tower of Repentance." What gave the tower its name, we are not told, but it is said that an English baronet, walking near the castle, saw a shepherd lad lying upon the ground reading attentively.

"What are you reading, lad?" he asked.

"The Bible, sir," replied the boy.

"The Bible! indeed!" laughed the gentleman; "then you must be wiser than the parson. Can you tell me the way to heaven?"

"Yes, sir, I can," replied the boy, in no way embarrassed by the mocking tone of the other; "you must go by way of yonder tower."

The gentleman saw that the boy had learned the lesson of his book well, and, rebuked, walked away in silence.

Adoniram Judson, the Famous Missionary to Burmah, once had his attention called by his wife to two newspaper articles, in one of which he was likened to the apostle Paul, and in the other to the beloved John; but he exclaimed with a sorrowfulness which made her regret having shown them to him: "Oh, how little—how little do they know me." "It is very evident that they do not know you," remarked she; "one day you are Peter, or Paul, or Luther, and the next gentle John, or mild Melancthon." "I do not want to be like any of them," he said, energetically, "Paul, nor Apollos, nor Cephas, nor any other mere man. I want to be like Christ. We have a great many aids and encouragers along the Christian path; but only one perfectly safe Exampler—only One who, tempted like as we are in every point, is still without sin. I want to follow Him only."

A PRIZED LOCK OF HAIR

"Do you see this lock of hair?" said an old man to me. "Yes; but what of it? It is, I suppose, the curl from the head of a dear child long since gone to God." "It is not. It is a lock of my own hair; and it is now nearly seventy years since it was cut from this head." "But why do you prize a lock of your own hair so much?" "It has a story belonging to it, and a strange one. I keep it thus with care because it speaks to me more of God, and of His special care, than anything else I possess. The story is this:

"I was a little child of four years old, with long curly locks which, in sun or rain or wind, hung down my cheeks uncovered. One day my father went into the wood to cut down a tree, and I went with him. I was standing a little way behind him, or rather at his side, watching with interest the strokes of the heavy axe as it went up and came down upon the wood, sending off splinters with every stroke, in all directions. Some of the splinters fell at my feet, and I eagerly stooped to pick them up. In doing so I stumbled forward, and in a moment my curly head lay upon the log. I had fallen just at the moment when the axe was coming down with all its force. It was too late to stop the blow. Down came the axe. I screamed, and my father fell to the ground in terror. He could not stay the stroke, and in the blindness which the sudden horror caused he thought he had killed his boy.

"We soon recovered—I from my fright and he from his terror. He caught me in his arms, and looked at me from head to foot, to find out the deadly wound which he was sure he had inflicted. Not a drop of blood nor a scar was to be seen. He knelt upon the grass, and gave thanks to a gracious God. Having done so, he took up his axe, and found a few hairs on its edge. He turned to the log he had been splitting, and there was a single curl of his boy's hair, sharply cut through and laid upon the wood. How great the escape! It was as if an angel had turned aside the edge at the moment it was descending on my head. With renewed thanks upon his lips he took up the curl, and went home with me in his arms.

"That curl he kept all his days, as a memorial of God's care and love. That curl he left to me on his death-bed. I keep it with care. It tells me of my father's God and mine. It rebukes unbelief and alarm. It bids me trust Him forever. I have had many tokens of fatherly love in my three-score years and ten, but this speaks most to my heart. It is the oldest and perhaps the most striking. It used to speak to my father's heart; it now speaks to mine."

A Zulu Restitution.—A Kaffir Girl in South Africa went to a missionary and dropped four sixpences into his hand, saying, "That is your money." "You don't owe me anything," replied the teacher. "I do," she answered, "and I will tell you how. At the public examination you promised a sixpence to any one in the class I was in who would write the best specimen on a slate. I gave in my slate and got the sixpence; but you did not know then that another person wrote that specimen for me. Yesterday you were reading in the church about Zaccheus, who said, 'If I have taken anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold.' I took from you one sixpence, and I bring you back four."

The Hostile Attitude Assumed by Several religious bodies in Great Britain toward the Church of England is liable to be misunderstood in this country, where we have no established church. It may be mistaken for hostility to the Church itself, which is not the case. The foremost place in the ranks of those who agitate for the disestablishment of the Episcopal Church is occupied by the Congregationalists, and at the recent meeting of the representatives of that sect it was declared that the objection to an established church is not against any particular church, but against the continuance of a national establishment of religion, independently of any consideration of that kind; that Congregationalists think well of the Church of England and its work, and would be sorry to see its spiritual force weakened.

Under Eastern Skies.

We arrived at Brindisi late on Saturday night; we were all very tired and worn out, and exceedingly glad to get to our journey's end. We stayed at an hotel near the sea, such a curious Eastern-looking place, with bare stone floors and whitewashed walls, and only just as much furniture in the large rooms as was absolutely necessary.

The next morning I awoke early, and went to my window and looked out. It seemed a perfect fairy-land to me. The harbor was as still as a lake, and covered with the reflection of the ships and boats, with their pretty latteen sails. And beyond the harbor there was the blue Mediterranean sparkling in the morning sunshine.

It looked very unlike Sunday, for work was going on just as on any other day; and the people of Brindisi were buying, and selling, and hurrying along, as though it were the busiest day in the week.

I took my Testament, and sat at a little distance from the window, and had a quiet time alone before Clemence came to say that Evelyn was dressed, and was going down-stairs for breakfast.

We were to go on board the steamer that night, as it was to sail early the next morning; but Sir William arranged that during the day we should stay quietly at the hotel.

The weather had been very cold when we were at Turin, and we found a great change of climate at Brindisi. The sky was a deep, unclouded blue, and the sunshine was so hot that we found it difficult to keep cool. Evelyn and I discovered a seat on the flat roof of the hotel, where we were shaded from the hot sun and could read together quietly. We read aloud the Psalms for the day, verse by verse. One of these was Psalm 122 and it was with a wonderfully strange feeling that we read those words: "Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem."

"May," said Evelyn, "can you believe that verse is really true of us?"

When we had finished our reading, Sir William came out to us, and persuaded us to venture out of the shady corner in which we had been sitting, and to walk to the other end of the roof, that we might look at the view to be seen from thence.

To our surprise we found that we were not alone on the roof. An English gentleman was leaning over the parapet with a book in his hand, looking toward the sea. He turned round as we came up, and slipped his book into his pocket. I fancied that it was a Bible.

Sir William and the strange gentleman soon got into conversation about Brindisi and its surroundings, and he pointed out to us several objects of interest in the neighborhood. He was not a very young man, though I fancied that he looked older than he really was. There was something in his face, when it was at rest, which made me think that he had been through a great deal of trouble, and yet, when he smiled, his whole face was lighted up in a moment, and he looked perfectly different. He was not exactly a handsome man, and yet his was a face which, having once seen, you could never forget, and which you could not help liking. That was my first impression of Mr. Stanley, so far as I can now remember.

Sir William was very charmed with him, and said afterward that he had seldom met such a well-read, sensible man. We sat together on the roof, and Evelyn and I acted the part of listeners, while the two gentlemen talked.

"You are going to Jerusalem, I think," said Mr. Stanley, as Sir William was unfolding his plans to him, "I have been there several times."

This led to many inquiries on Sir William's part about the [illegible] to be found in Jerusalem, etc., etc. But Evelyn and I wondered very much how Mr. Stanley knew that we were going to Jerusalem. Could he have heard us reading that Psalm, and saying that it was soon to be true of us?

"I am afraid you will be disappointed in Jerusalem," said Mr. Stanley, turning to us; "you must remember that though it is still 'beautiful for situation,' yet Jerusalem is no longer 'the joy of the whole earth.' It is, indeed, beautiful at a distance, and every one is charmed who sees it for the first time; but when you go inside the walls, and know it well, you cannot help feeling depressed and saddened."

"But there are brighter days coming for Jerusalem," I ventured to say.

"Yes, indeed," said Mr. Stanley, "Jerusalem will be a hundredfold more than she ever was before—the City of the Great King."

But Sir William always regarded the study of prophecy as a mixture of presumption and romance, and he quickly led the conversation into a different channel; but I longed to hear what Mr. Stanley's views were about the return of the Jews and the restoration of Jerusalem.

That evening we went on board the steamer which was to take us to Alexandria. There were a great many first-class passengers, and we had some difficulty in obtaining a cabin to ourselves. At length Sir William managed to secure a small one for Evelyn and me, in which there were only two berths, and as soon as table d'hote was over we went to our cabin.

There were very few passengers present at dinner; Mr. Stanley was there, and a few others whom we had seen in the hotel at Brindisi; but most of the people came on board as we were going to bed. They had just arrived by the late train from Turin, and had secured their cabins beforehand by telegraphing to the captain.

Evelyn and I were undressing when we heard a voice in the saloon, which we were almost sure we knew. It was a lady's voice, and she was giving orders to the stewardess in an imperious tone, with regard to the arrangement of her cabin.

"That must be Lady Eldridge," said Evelyn to me; "it is exactly like her voice."

Clemence went at this moment, to get some hot water, and returned with the information that it was Lady Eldridge, and that she had taken the next cabin to ours.

"Oh dear!" said Evelyn, "I wonder where she is going. I hope not to Cairo; I remember she often spends the winter there. Well, we shall hear in the morning!"

As Lady Eldridge's voice had been the last thing we heard at night, so it was the first thing that we heard in the morning. She had brought no maid with her; and, as she was utterly unable to do anything for herself, she was constantly calling the poor stewardess, who had already more work than she could get through, to help her in the various stages of her toilet.

"Oh dear!" said Evelyn, as Lady Eldridge's voice was heard again and again, "I do hope she is not going to Cairo; we must find out at once."

We met Lady Eldridge at breakfast; she professed herself delighted beyond measure at meeting Sir William and Evelyn, and wished to know where they were going, and how long she would have the wonderful pleasure of travelling in their company.

"It is such trying work travelling alone, my dear," she said to Evelyn, "and I am naturally very nervous; it is really quite miraculous my meeting you. Sir William, I feel sure, will not refuse to take me under his care."

Sir William bowed, and said he would be very glad to help Lady Eldridge in any way he could; but I did not think he seemd particularly glad of the addition to our party, for such Lady Eldridge, from that moment, considered herself to be. She turned over all responsibility about her baggage to Sir William, and she used Clemence as freely as if she had been her own maid.

"But," said Lady Eldridge, as we were finishing breakfast, "you have never yet told me where you are going, Evelyn, my dear."

Evelyn was about to answer her, when, to my surprise, Sir William prevented her.

"Our plans are not yet formed, Lady Eldridge," he said; "I am going to consider this morning what our tour will be, and then I shall be able to let you know."

"Oh, you must come to Cairo," said Lady Eldridge decidedly; "there is no place like Cairo in the winter. The climate is simply perfect, my dear," she said, turning to Evelyn. "Now, Sir William, you must decide to stay at least three months at Cairo, and then we can all spend the winter together. Now come, I think that is a capital plan!"

Sir William smiled and said he would consider the matter; but there were many other places that he wished to visit, and he could not make up his mind hastily. We did not see much of Lady Eldridge after breakfast, for she remained in the saloon the whole day reading a French novel, and seemed to think us very extraordinary girls because we chose to go on deck.

Evelyn and I found a sheltered seat, where the cold wind did not reach us; and here we sat with our books and our work until the evening. The steamer had started early in the morning, and though a fresh breeze was blowing, still the sea was not uncomfortably rough, and we were beginning to think that sea voyages were not half so disagreeable and uncomfortable as people made them out to be.

Sir William paced up and down the deck with Mr. Stanley nearly all the morning, discussing his future plans. Every now and then they stopped to examine a map or a guide-book; and at length they sat down on a seat, and Sir William took a pencil from his pocket and wrote at Mr. Stanley's dictation.

"I wonder what papa has settled!" said Evelyn. "I wish he would come and tell us. I am sure he does not want to go to Cairo, now that Lady Eldridge is going there. Did not you notice that he would not let me say where we were going?"

When Sir William had finished writing, he and Mr. Stanley came toward us, and Sir William told us, to our great joy, that we were going at once to Jerusalem. Mr. Stanley had told them that there was a clean, comfortable hotel there, and that the climate in December and January was generally beautiful.

"So I think we will stop in Jerusalem a month or two," said Sir William, "and then decide where we go next. What do you say to that, Evelyn?"

"Oh, papa," said Evelyn, "it is just what I wanted. I am longing to get to Jerusalem!"

"Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem," said Mr. Stanley with a smile. And then we were sure that he had heard us reading the Psalm.

At sunset the wind became very strong; the ship rolled heavily, and the passengers were glad to go to their cabins. It was a dreadful night. I shall never forget it. Every hour the storm became more terrible. I had never thought that a storm at sea could be so dreadful. The waves were beating over our heads, and, every now and then, the cabin was lighted up by a vivid flash of lightning, which was followed almost immediately by a terrible clap of thunder. Every two or three minutes we heard the crash of breaking crockery, and the broken cups and jugs and glasses were thrown backward and forward on the floor, as the ship pitched and tossed.

I wonder that so many people have such peaceful ideas of the Mediterranean Sea, after reading the Bible accounts of it. Oh, how often during that dreadful night we thought of St. Paul in the storm, probably just in this very part of the Mediterranean; and we could so well picture that scene in Jonah's life when the sailors, unwilling to cast him overboard, made a last mighty effort to bring the ship to land, but the sea wrought and was tempestuous, and they were not able to manage it.

And then David's description of the storm, in Psalm 107, must refer to this very sea. How often we repeated those verses to each other that night: "He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Then are they glad because they be quiet; so He bringeth them unto their desired haven."

"Oh, May," said Evelyn, as I crept to her side when the storm was at its height, "what a comfort it is to know we are safe, isn't it?'

"Yes," I said, "I cannot think how any one dare travel, and go through all the perils by land and water, without knowing that."

"I should not have known it if we had come a year ago," said Evelyn. "Oh, May, I should have been terribly frightened then."

We did not sleep once the whole night, and very long the hours seemed to us.

At about three o'clock in the morning we heard Lady Eldridge's voice loudly crying for help. She was calling, first for Clemence and then for the stewardess, but their cabins were at the other end of the saloon, and neither of them heard her.

"What can she want?" said Evelyn.

I put on my dressing-gown, and managed to go as far as the door of Lady Eldridge's cabin, that I might see what was the matter.

"Just look here, Miss Lindsay!" she said; "the porthole burst open, and the water has come over my bed. Do go and call the stewardess, and tell her to bring me clean linen and blankets."

ZACHARIAS AND ELIZABETH.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 2d, Luke 1 : 5-25. Golden Text, ver. 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

It is most important to notice that the parents of the only child mentioned in the Word of God who was filled with the Holy Ghost from his birth were both of them wholly devoted to the Lord. We read, "There was in the days of Herod, the king of Judea, a certain priest named Zacharias, of the course of Abia: and his wife was of the daughters of Aaron, and her name was Elizabeth. And they were both righteous before God, walking n all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless." "Righteous before God." There are many who are righteous in their own eyes, but not before God. The Lord Jesus found occasion to speak a parable "unto certain which trusted in themselves that they were righteous, and despised others" (Luke 18 : 9). "Woe unto them that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight" (Isa. 5 : 21). The Apostle Paul writes, "Be not wise in your own conceits" (Rom. 12 : 16). But Oh, how blessed it is to be righteous before God, to have no occasion to shrink from, but, on the contrary, to welcome, His scrutinizing gaze.

Thus was it with both Zacharias and Elizabeth. They were wholly given to do the will of God; there was a true symmetry in their religious life, no exception in their piety; they walked "in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless." There are sometimes children of God who are exceedingly conscientious about certain things, while n other things they are lax and careless. Some, or instance, who are very unworldly as far as external worldliness is concerned, but who have never learned by love to "serve one another" (Gal. 5 : 13), and who, consequently, have little scruple as to how much trouble or inconvenience they give to other people, and often they are unconscious that Christianity enters into the small details of daily ife. Of how few Christians can it be said that they are blameless! and yet it is our calling to be "blameness and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke" (Phil. 2 : 15).

Again, how often do we find a minister of God who lives for his Master whose whole being is laid upon the altar of the Lord in living sacrifice, but who, instead of being helped and strengthened by a wife who is like-minded, and who lives the truth her husband preaches before the parish, is really obliged to bear the burden of his wife as well as he burden of his parish. Blessed, indeed, is the minister of God who meets with a helpmeet like-minded. In the evil times in which they lived, when ittle true religious life existed in Jerusalem, and here was only an humble few who "looked for redemption in Jerusalem" (Luke 2 : 38), Zacharias must have been especially blessed in the sympathy and succor of his wife. They had no child, and probably the spiritual need of Israel lay strongly on he hearts of them both.

It was at the time that Zacharias was burning ncense unto the Lord, whether as in Exodus 30 : , the daily burning of incense, or, as might be imgined from the fact of "the whole multitude of the people . . . praying without," the offering of ncense on the great day of atonement—s not learly stated. "And there appeared unto Him an ngel of the Lord, standing on the right side of the altar of incense. And when Zacharias saw him he was troubled, and fear fell upon him." Oh, how strange it is that sometimes what we most desired, when it comes causes trouble and dismay! God's visitation is not what we have expected, and instead of trusting His way of dealing with us, believing that He knows best, we sometimes have feared as though He were not to be trusted. The angel reassured the trembling priest, and said unto him, "Fear not, Zacharias: for thy prayer is heard; and thy wife Elizabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John."

What was this prayer of Zacharias which was heard? Was it that he might have a child? Oh, surely it was something greater. From the words which follow we should gather that this aged couple had been sighing during many long years for a better and holier state of things in the Lord's land. The coming of the Messiah was probably the burden of their prayers alone, together, and when assembled with the little group who were steadfastly looking out, with a single eye, for God's great deliverance. Selfish motives found no place in these noble souls; they lived to bear the burden of the Lord, the burden of Israel.

The angel continued his message. "And thou shalt have joy and gladness; and many shall rejoice at his birth. For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and shall drink neither wine nor strong drink; and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb. And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God.' This latter clause was, perhaps, the very core of the answer to the old priest's prayer. From how many faithful ministers' hearts the cry goes up, "How can I turn this people to the Lord their God? What means can I use, what arguments can I employ, to bring those who are dead in trespasses and sins in contact with Him who is their life?" More and more is it the experience of those who win souls, that more work is done alone with God than by all the efforts which they put forth. It may be that Zacharias had wept and prayed over the people throughout his term of priesthood, and had seen little fruit of his labors; and now came the answer to his prayers in a way he had not looked for.

The message was not yet ended. "And he shall go before them in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." The priest would recognize in this last part of the angel's message the last prophecy of the then written Scriptures—a prophecy which, perhaps, lay nearer to his heart than almost any other, because it gave him a sign by which he should know when the Lord the Messiah was at hand. But the angel added a clause which was not contained in the prophecy of Malachi, "he shall turn . . . the disobedient to the wisdom of the just." The old priest could pray, but he saw no conversions; he could mourn over the disobedient, but he knew it needed a power stronger than his to deal with them; in the depth of his heart, blameless until now, there lay a vein of unbelief.

While God carries out His own purposes, He carries out at the same time, the education of His children. A faith which seems to be peerless, when tried only in the ordinary way, may yet be found to fail when applied suddenly to something most unexpected. The man who hitherto was blameless began now to be blameworthy. God was leading him a step farther than he had gone hitherto, and he had to learn how little was his faith. Perhaps he looked too much to experience, and the whole message was so improbable. Such blessing as the angel foretold was quite beyond his expectations, and if he himself had so little fruit to his ministry, even if God gave him a son, was it likely that his son could do more than he had done? For the first time it may be a strong doubt arose in the heart of Zacharias, and although it probably included the whole of the angel's message, yet its fastened more especially on the first part of the promise, and he "said unto the angel, whereby shall I know this? for I am an old man, and my wife well stricken in years." "Whereby shall I know?" Was it not enough that the Lord had said it? This is the real meaning of every doubt of God. Whereby shall I know that the Lord means what He says? Whereby shall I know that He is in earnest?

"And the angel answering said unto him, I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God; and am sent to speak unto thee, and to shew thee these glad tidings. And, behold, thou shalt be dumb, and not able to speak, until the day that these things shall be performed, because thou believest not my words, which shall be fulfilled in their season." It is as though the angel had said, "My office as God's messenger to thee, and the presence in which I stand is the guarantee that my words are true." But just because Zacharias was no ordinary man of God, he could not be guilty of unbelief without receiving chastisement. God is most exact with those who live nearest to him. On account of one failure of faith, because God was not sanctified in him before the congregation, Moses was forbidden an entrance into the land of promise (Num. 20 : 12), and here the hitherto blameless priest of God must be rendered dumb for the sin of unbelief, for he who was to be the father of Christ's forerunner must be fitted in all respects for such a responsibility. John the Baptist must be born into no atmosphere of unbelief.

"The people waited for Zacharias, and marvelled that he tarried so long in the temple. And when he came out, he could not speak unto them; and they perceived that he had seen a vision in the temple; for he beckoned unto them, and remained speechless." But although they were conscious that God had been communicating something to his servant, they knew not what had passed in that interview with God. Oh, how near unconverted people, or weak believers, may be in bodily presence to those to whom God is making communications about His purposes, and they have no ears to hear, no heart to understand them! "Surely the Lord will do nothing; but He revealeth His secret unto His servants the prophets" (Amos 3 : 7). While some men are striving about petty personal advantage, about some fancied honor, about some imaginary grievance, God is opening to some of His servants His own great thoughts of holiness and power and love, and making them understand the signs of the times.

We notice that dumbness is not mentioned among such blemishes as would render priests unfit for their office. Could it be that during "the days of his ministration" (ver. 23), which were not yet accomplished, the aged priest offered the sacrifices mute, and thus was humbled before the people for whom he ministered to God? or was dumbness included, although not mentioned in God's prohibition? We read, "No man that hath a blemish of the seed of Aaron the priest shall come nigh to offer the offerings of the Lord made by fire: he hath a blemish; he shall not come nigh to offer the bread of his God. He shall eat the bread of his God, both of the most holy, and of the holy. Only he shall not go in unto the vail, nor come nigh unto the altar, because he hath a blemish; that he profane not my sanctuaries: for I the Lord do sanctify them" (Lev. 21 : 21-23).

When the days of his ministration were accomplished, he departed to his own house, which was not in Jerusalem but in "the hill country" (ver. 39). "And after those days his wife Elizabeth conceived, and hid herself five months, saying, Thus hath the Lord dealt with me in the days wherein He looked on me, to take away my reproach among men." Among the Jewish women it was regarded as a chastisement if they were childless. Thus when Rachel bare Joseph, she said, "God hath taken away my reproach" (Gen. 30 : 23). "Lo, children are an heritage of the Lord, and the fruit of the womb is His reward," or, as is better expressed in the Prayer-Book version, "Lo, children and the fruit of the womb are an heritage and gift that cometh of the Lord" (Psalm, 117 : 4). Perhaps Elizabeth hid herself that she might be alone with God and receive from Him the wisdom and grace necessary for the charge which He had promised to give her. Too often we rush into positions of great responsibility without the preparation which a time alone with God might have wrought in us, and thus so much of our work both as mothers and as workers for God is ineffectual and unfruitful.

To Our Readers.

IT is again our privilege to acknowledge the favor of God in the success which has attended the publication of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Neither expense nor exertion has been spared to increase the circulation of the journal; but the blessing of the Most High, by whom all circumstances are controlled, has been entreated on every effort, and our duty now is humbly and distinctly to ascribe the result to Him.

THE CIRCULATION

has a little more than doubled in the past twelve months. It now equals or surpasses that of two thirds of the leading religious weeklies of New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago. The paper has not stood still for a day. There has not been a day, not even during the dullest period of the summer, when we have not received five or more subscribers, and we have on several days, before the great rush of the present month, received more than FIFTY. The sales by the NEWS COMPANIES have kept rapid pace with the subscription list, and are, we believe, without parallel among religious papers in this country.

During the year, the publisher has personally travelled in the following States, in each of which agents are now actively at work in the interest of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

Alabama,
Arkansas,
Florida,
Georgia,
Kentucky,
Louisiana,
Massachusetts,
New Hampshire,
New Jersey,
New York,
North Carolina,
Ohio,
Pennsylvania,
Rhode Island,
South Carolina,
Tennessee,
Texas,
Vermont,
Virginia.

The circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has extended beyond seas in a manner that surpasses all our anticipations of last year. Without counting one free copy, the paper goes by subscription to the following countries, provinces, and dependencies, outside of the United States:

Bahamas,
British Columbia,
Burmah,
Cape Colony,
England,
India,
Ireland,
Japan,
Manitoba (Canada),
Mexico,
New Brunswick,
North-West Territories (Canada),
Nova Scotia,
Ontario (Canada),
Prince Edward Island,
Quebec (Canada),
Sandwich Islands,
Scotland,
Switzerland,
Turkey,
U. S. of Colombia (South America),
West Coast of Africa.

The subscription list in the United States embraces every one of the thirty-nine States and ten Territories.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD commends itself to the following classes:

THE PEOPLE

take it because it is strictly undenominational.

MINISTERS

take it because it does not interfere with any other religious paper.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS

take it because between the sermons of Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage they get the purest and most instructive reading of modern literature. The Sunday-School Lessons in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are written by Mrs. M. Baxter.

SUBSCRIBERS

renew for it because it is never forced upon them after their subscriptions expire, unless they order it to be continued.

FAMILIES

like it because it gives a clear Gospel note on every page, and because it never trifles with sacred subjects.

LADIES

like it intuitively, and it is the most welcome New Year's Gift that can be presented to them.

CHILDREN

like it because they can understand it.

CHRISTIANS

take it because it is the outspoken foe of Rationalism, Romanism, Ritualism, Unitarianism, Universalism, and Moderate Drinking.

TRACT DISTRIBUTERS

take it because it is one of the best tracts they can give away.

AGENTS

canvass for it because they cannot make the same commission as easily on any other publication.

NEWSDEALERS

take it because the low price brings many customers.

ORTRAIT OF PRINCE LEOPOLD, and Picture of Old Temple Bar, and the New Temple Bar Memorial

H.R.H. PRINCE LEOPOLD,

The Royal Scholar.

Birth in 1853—His Accident at Darmstadt in 1878—His Visits to the Empress Eugenie at Chiselhurst—Studious Habits and Public Speeches—Is made a "Freeman" of London—Opening of Firth College, Sheffield—Unveiling of the Temple Bar Memorial.

Prince Leopold George Duncan Albert, the fourth and youngest son of Victoria, Queen of England, was born at Buckingham Palace, April 7, 1853. Within a few days after his birth the Queen wrote to her uncle, King Leopold of Belgium: "I can report most favorably of myself, for I have never been better or stronger. Stockmar will have told you that Leopold is to be the name of our fourth young gentleman. It is a mark of love and affection to you which I hope you will not disapprove. It is a name which is dearest to me after Albert's, and one which recalls the almost only happy days of my sad childhood. To hear 'Prince Leopold' again will make me think of all those days. His other names will be George Duncan Albert, and the sponsors the King of Hanover, Ernest Hohenlohe, the Princess of Prussia, and Mary Cambridge. George is after the King of Hanover, and Duncan is a compliment to dear Scotland."

The young Prince was not baptized till the 28th of June, when the service was performed at the chapel in Buckingham Palace, and the sponsors named by the Queen were present in person.

Prince Leopold has never enjoyed robust health, and an accident he met with by slipping while stepping into a carriage has not tended to improve it. It prevented his attending the wedding of his brother, the Duke of Connaught, in March, 1879. He was to have been one of the Duke's "groomsmen" on that happy occasion, but while at Darmstadt, whither he had gone after the death of his sister, the Princess Alice, in December, 1878, this accident befell him, and his condition for some time occasioned no little anxiety. Occasionally paragraphs appear in the British papers giving somewhat exaggerated reports of his illness. The truth appears to be that the sprain of the knee-joints, which he received in the casualty referred to, has never been thoroughly cured, and that occasionally unfavorable symptoms present themselves. On the best authority, however, it is stated that these symptoms are generally of so trivial a character as to justify no apprehension.

After the crushing blow which fell upon the Empress Eugenie by the loss of her only son, Louis Napoleon, in 1879, it will have been noticed that in the visits of her Majesty the Queen to Chiselhurst she has generally been accompanied by her son, Prince Leopold. The Queen has long been known to be the intimate friend of the Empress, and was naturally among the first to offer all the consolation which in so sad an hour could spring from true friendship only. Prince Leopold went with the Queen on her first visit of condolence, and both his Royal Highness and the Princess Beatrice were admitted to the chamber of mourning. The Queen was observed to be in the deepest grief, shedding tears as she entered the saloon, while Prince Leopold and his sister were also overcome by emotion. It was evident that a friend had been lost, and that his early death had occasioned the profoundest sorrow.

It has been generally understood that Prince Leopold has, for several years, been a close and earnest student, and the speeches which he has delivered on public occasions have given no slight evidence of the breadth of his reading and of a certain enthusiasm in his pursuit of the pleasures of literature. It is said, indeed, that in this respect he more closely resembles his lamented father than either of his brothers, and that his mental characteristics also are very much those of the late Prince Consort.

One of Prince Leopold's more recent speeches was delivered at the annual meeting of the Royal Association in Aid of the Deaf and Dumb, held, by permission of the Duke of Westminster, at Grosvenor House, London. There was a large gathering of ladies and gentlemen present, and it was exceedingly interesting to note that the addresses of Prince Leopold and other speakers on the occasion were interpreted to the deaf and dumb by the sign language as they were delivered.

In October, 1875, Prince Leopold, to use a common expression, "took up" the freedom of the city of London. It will be remembered that he was entitled to this privilege; his father having been a freeman of the city, it became the son's by right of patrimony. It is required of those who are admitted formally to declare their obedience to the Lord Mayor, and to express their readiness to preserve all the rights and privileges of the City. In the case of personages of high rank the day on which the freedom of the city is conferred upon them is usually one of popular rejoicings in the city, and on the occasion of Prince Leopold's admission the court in Guildhall was filled with one of the largest assemblies of the year. Mr. Chamberlain Scott, in addressing him, said that his Royal Highness was the last of the sons of the revered father who had enrolled themselves as freemen in right of citizenship.

Prince Leopold, in reply, said that, although it was true that, according to the constitution of the city, he was entitled by right of birth to the privileges of the city of London freemen, he did not on that account feel less inclined to set a high value on the kind and courteous manner in which these privileges had been conferred, nor could he omit to thank them most heartily for the handsome casket in which that freedom was bestowed, and which, he assured them, he should ever prize as a memorial of the honor that day done him. "Were I not," said the Prince, "immediately connected by family traditions with your ancient and honorable Corporation, I must, nevertheless, have esteemed it a high honor to be associated with the long list of illustrious men who have, from time to time, been placed upon your rolls, and to be connected with a body which has ever been so remarkable for its loyalty in the truest sense of the word, and for its attachment to the laws and institutions of this country."

His Royal Highness is in great demand for opening ceremonies and the inauguration of public buildings. Apart from the unveiling of the Temple Bar Memorial, on November 8th this year, the most prominent service of the kind he has rendered was in September, 1879, on the occasion of opening Firth College, Sheffield. This magnificent building, which cost more than £20,000, was given to the town of Sheffield by Mr. Firth, one of its most successful and benevolent manufacturers. Prince Leopold also takes a deep interest in the work of literary and scientific institutions, and in 1879 presided over an important meeting held at the Birbeck Institution, London.

TEMPLE BAR.

The Ancient Western City Boundary—The Monarch's Entrance into the City—Public Exposure of Traitors' Heads—Lord Nelson's and the Duke of Wellington's Funerals—Reception to the Princess of Wales.

Among the relics of ancient times which stood as landmarks in the city of London streets, but which are one after another being swept away by the tide of modern improvement, was old Temple Bar, a small picture of which appears on the upper left-hand corner of our frontispiece.

The ancient structure has been removed to accommodate the ever-increasing traffic of the city of London, and its site is marked by the Memorial Monument which was unveiled by Prince Leopold on November 8th. It consists of a basement of blue Guernsey granite and pedestal of red granite. On the pedestal are four basso-relievos in bronze, representing incidents in the life of the Queen, viz.: Her progress through the city, and visit to the Guildhall in June, 1837, and Her Majesty en route to St. Paul's in 1872, to return thanks for the recovery of the Prince of Wales from a serious illness. The whole is surmounted by a small pedestal, with an heraldic griffin holding the city shield. Our picture shows the niche on the south side containing a statue, in Sicilian marble, of the Queen. On the north side is a similar statue of the Prince of Wales. The total height of the Memorial is 31 feet 6 inches.

The Bar divided the city of London from Westminster, and was of considerable antiquity. In early times the bounds were marked by posts and a chain, or bar, which, from its contiguity to the Temple, accounts for the appellation that it bore. Early in the seventeenth century this bar was superseded by a wooden house erected across the street, with a narrow gateway underneath. This having been burned down in the great fire of 1666, the late structure was erected by Sir Christopher Wren. Having been built not long after the Restoration, when the Stuarts were again popular with the people generally, three out of four niches were filled with statues of members of the royal family. The fourth recess was occupied by an effigy of Queen Elizabeth, who had always been a favorite with the citizens of London.

Temple Bar used to mark the western boundary of the Lord Mayor's authority, and was associated with ancient and pompous ceremonies that usually attended the monarch's entrance to the city. Before entrance the gate of the Bar was closed against the sovereign, and he was required to ask the Lord Mayor's permission to enter within his domain. The origin of this particular custom cannot now be traced. The Mayor, upon receiving the request, acceded most complacently, and with all respect handed the king, on bended knee, the key which would admit him within the precinct. He also gave up his sword and mace, in token that he was not a rival, but a loyal subject, and the king as readily returned the same, in token that he had confidence in the Mayor's integrity, and was willing to retain his services as his lieutenant. At the present day such formalities are useless, for Londoners now possess the goodly heritage of constitutional freedom that has been so dearly bought and faithfully handed down to them by the vigilance and valor of their heroic sires.

The double tide of State pomp and civic ceremony often met and mingled at Temple Bar at some of the great epochs of modern English history. Thus, after the destruction of the Spanish Armada, Queen Elizabeth and her court passed in magnificence to St. Paul's Cathedral, there to offer up a nation's thanks for its signal deliverance from the weapons and menacing hosts of Rome.

But assocations of a ghastly character are connected with this celebrated gateway. For more than a century after its erection it was known as a sort of "City Golgotha," where the bleaching skulls and decaying limbs of traitors were publicly exposed for the purpose of gratfying the loyalty of the adherents of the reigning family, and striking a salutary terror into the hearts of the disaffected.

The first instance of the now demolished Temple Bar being used for these purposes occurred toward the close of the reign of Charles II., when one part of the quartered body of Sir Thomas Armstrong was barbarously exhibited to the public gaze. He was the last remaining victim of the conspiracy known in history as the Rye House Plot. His head was affixed to an iron rod on the top of Westminster Hall; two other quarters of the body were impaled on Aldersgate and Aldgate, in the east of London, while the fourth portion was sent down to Stafford, the borough which he had represented in Parliament.

The next "ornaments" of Temple Bar consisted of the head and limbs of Sir John Friend and the headless trunk of Sir W. Parkins, who, in connection with about forty other conspirators, in 1695, had been engaged in a plot to assassinate King William III., on his return from Richmond, where he was accustomed to hunt on Saturdays. They were executed on April 3, 1696.

The next grim tenant of the old frowning gateway was the head of Colonel Henry Oxburg, who, in the insurrection on behalf of the Pretender, in 1715, just after the accession of George I., had joined the rebel forces in the north. The campaign terminated most disastrously, and Colonel Oxburg was captured and executed. Among the enthusiastic adherents of the Pretender was Christopher Layer, who hoped to accomplish, by assassinating George I., what armies in the field had failed to effect. His plot was, however, discovrestless away from Constance as it is in the nature of an unsatisfied man to be, came once more to Rochester, to seek the interview he longed for.

Constance felt painfully nervous and shy, and very much inclined to escape from her companion. But good breeding conquered the inclination to leave her visitor alone, or was it love? They had only exchanged a few brief sentences with much hesitation and awkwardness on both sides, when Constance said, "May I ask you a question, Mr. Ferguson?"

"Anything you like to ask me," he answered.

"I have wondered how you came to be in Rochester that day?"

"And I have wanted to explain to you," he replied. "Constance, I wanted to see you again, so I decided to indulge myself with a run to Canterbury to have a chat with my good friend Roland Mitchell. Imagining you would be in the schoolroom till evening, I concluded to stay a few hours on my way at Rochester, which I had never visited before. Just imagine, if you can, what were my feelings when—. But you can't imagine, Constance, for I have not told you yet how passionately I have loved you for years."

"I was so proud of your cleverness when you were almost a child, Constance, and I grieved so when you seemed to resent the interest I felt in you, though I told myself it was natural in you, feeling your own strength and fine powers, and ability to run alone without my aid. I did not know I loved you, dear—I mean I did not call it love even to myself, till you returned from Germany. But when I saw you matured, ripened into just what I wished and most admired in woman, even that first moment when I met you at London Bridge Station, and saw you first before Cecil, I knew my life's love was fixed forever, whether for my weal or woe. Constance, since then, until these last few happier days, you have been like a fair, beautiful icicle—pure, shining, lovely, but cold—ah, so cold! What made you repel me so? And are you thawed at last."

Constance was battling in her own mind as to the perfectness of the confidence she ought to repose in him before she owned her love for him.

"Shall I tell you," she asked at length, "why I did not quite like you long ago, and why I did not want to obey you?"

"Do," he answered, wondering at her words.

"I thought—" she hesitated—"I dont like to say so, but I believe I ought to tell you, Mr. Ferguson, I thought you liked mamma."

"Liked mamma!" he repeated, and a pained expression crossed his face, and then involuntarily he smiled. "My precious girl, my dearest Constance, such a thought, I frankly and unhesitatingly state, never entered my mind for one moment till now that I hear it from you. It was utterly impossible, because, you see, I loved 'mamma's' daughter."

Constance could not help smiling.

Again his playful tone changed to solemn entreaty, as he added, "Constance, can you not love me now?"

For answer she turned her radiant face toward him with a smile, and he clasped her to his heart.

THE END.

REMARKABLE CASE OF HEALING BY FAITH.

A Tumor of Five Years' Growth Cured by Prayer.

MRS. LUCY A. LEAR, wife of a colored minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in Anacostia, Washington, D. C., gives the following account of the cure recently of a tumor of five years' growth:

"In 1875 the tumor first appeared, and increased up to June, 1880. I became entirely prostrated, physicians giving me up to die, but while exercising faith in prayer and trust in God there was a sudden and unexpected change for the better. I kept praying every day that God would strengthen me and give me that faith that I could take hold of Him in believing prayer; and I prayed until I had that faith to believe that I could trust my life and all things into His hands, and that He would heal me of the tumor if it was His will, and make me a well woman, which I am to-day, in answer, I believe, to faith and prayer.

"I was so much better that I was able to go out and commune in my church, when I was spiritually blessed. After that I remained for a month or two decidedly better, when I was taken suddenly worse. Physicians were called in, and gave me up for death. When I came to myself after a fit of unconsciousness, my first thoughts were, How good it was to wait upon God, and trust in Him. My husband, upon coming home that night, thought the medicine was killing me, and discharged the physician the next morning, so that I was left with neither physician nor medicine. Then I said, 'Lord, here I am in thine hands for thy will to be done; either to heal me or to take me; make me perfectly resigned to Thy will whatsoever it may be.' And I felt perfectly willing and resigned to His will whatsoever it might be.

"I got up after that feeling much relieved, and continued to improve up to last June (1880), when I was again taken worse, and thought that death would ensue. I threw myself right upon Christ for His will to be done. I took no medicine then, nor had a physician. Next day, however, the tumor passed from me, and I became, it seems to me almost in the twinkling of an eye, a well woman, and I gave praise to God, and felt as if my soul was converted over again that day, I was so filled with joy and with the Holy Ghost; for indeed it was a great day, and it was a happy day in this house. My appetite returned, and I eat a hearty dinner; and it seemed as if with every mouthful that I eat I gave praise to God; and I am to-day as well a woman as I ever was. Praise be to the Lord!"

Mrs. Lear's husband adds the following:

"During my wife's suffering I prayed that the will of God might be done in her case, waiting patiently for Him and watching. When I returned to my house on the day that she was relieved of the tumor I found her rejoicing, and we were both lost in wonder and surprise; and our hearts were melted with gratitude to God for His wonderful dealings toward her.

The above statements are fully corroborated by the Rev. S. Blagden, who was mainly instrumental in urging Mrs. Lear to put faith in God's power to heal the most desperate and incurable cases. He prayed frequently in the sick woman's household; and in private spent many hours in prayer for her, when, as he says, his whole being wrestled in prayer that if it were in accordance with the will of God He would grant their request, and forgive and heal for His name's sake.

THE NIOBE OF THE NATIONS.

Ireland's Woe—The Famine Appalling—Feeding the Children—"As Good as an American."

ON Monday, December 20th, the Rev. George Hepworth, D.D., delivered a lecture on what he saw in Ireland during the late famine. It will be remembered that Dr. Hepworth was selectd has one of the gentlemen who were charged with the distribution of the fund raised for the relief of the sufferers in the famine by the New York Herald. There were three funds raised. The contributions sent to the CHRISTIAN HERALD were sent to the New York Herald fund, and were regularly acknowledged in that journal. Dr. Hepworth in the course of his lecture made the following remarks:

During the latter part of February of the current year, during a day's journey through Germany, I found myself in the sleepy little town of Darmstadt, hoping there to obtain rest. I no sooner halted there than there was put into my hand a telegram from Mr. James Gordon Bennett, saying that Ireland was smitten with a great misfortune, that a large sum of money had been collected for its relief, that I was chosen for its disbursement.

The first question which met me in London was, Was there a real famine or was it the usual cry of Irish distress? The British Government had taken no cognizance of the fact that they were starving across the Channel, for governments work slowly. I found, the very moment I touched Ireland, the exact facts of the case. The crop of 1877 was a great disappointment, that of the year 1878 was almost a total loss, and that of 1879 had been smitten by blight. From Donegal in the North to Kerry in the South one half of the population was actually without food.

The banks, whose custom it was to lend on good security, had closed their doors. With everything mortgaged, with tenants hopelessly in arrears, with no crops to live on, and no food for the future, the condition of Ireland seemed horrible indeed. A hungry nation (strange and alarming spectacle) knocked at the world's doors and asked for a crust to satisfy its hunger. A generous host within answered the call at once.

THE THREE FAMINE FUNDS.

There were three funds in the field. The first was that of Her Grace the Duchess of Marlborough, the second that of the Lord Mayor of Dublin, and the third the New York Herald Fund.

Now, ladies and gentlemen, that the funds you sent to Ireland saved that country from a repetition of the dreadful scenes of 1847 is beyond all manner of doubt. If there were few deaths, if there were not more, it was because generous men and women from all quarters of the globe prevented their possibility. There were some and a large number were occasioned by want of nutritious food,—that is beyond peradventure. I visited the western and southern parts of the island, and I never saw such inexpressible misery; thank God, as a man coming from America never can see, and God grant he never may see!

I have been among hundreds and hundreds of families where their little all to eat consisted of the Indian meal you had sent. The family had parted with its cow, had sent its pigs to market, had pawned its clothes—both of the body and bed—and then stood in almost utter nakedness and supreme despair, face to face, apparently, with inevitable death.

Two classes excited my pity. To one I could afford little relief; but of four millions of people a certain proportion must be sick, and these sick people must almost surely die. To be sick was the sign of death. I could give them meal, but their tender and delicate systems rejected such coarse food, and they lingered on until at sundown the life went out. Next I was stirred by the aspect of and I think I can see strong men in a hungry condition and not be moved, but when I see the little child famishing my eyes fill with tears. I have myself seen little children on the wayside halfway to school lying down on the road in a dead faint because they had tasted nothing for twenty-four hours, and I went back to Dublin and said to the committee, "If we can save no one else, let us save the children." In the course of four weeks your committee were giving breakfasts to more than fifty thousand children every day, and in a fortnight's time further we received hundreds of letters telling us the bright bloom had come back to the cheeks and the light to the eyes of the little ones.

Again I was disturbed by the inhabitants of the islands adjacent to the mainland, who were in a very sad plight, without clothes to wear, or food to eat, or medicine. I went to Her Grace the Duchess of Marlborough, and she promised to enlist the sympathy of Prince Alfred, the Duke of Edinburgh, and I received a request to meet her at the castle, and I conferred with the Duke on the state of Ireland. He very kindly said he would place at the service of the American committee the seven vessels at his command for the relief. I ought to speak a kind word for this gentleman, who undertook the personal distribution of the cargo, under the direction of the committee. I found him practical, and with especial enthusiasm in this particular cause, forgetting the title of nobility he possessed and going into the rudest cabins just as I would.

I said one day to a friend that the Duke was as good as an American, and when he met me subsequently at dinner he smiled at the repetition of the compliment; but I think it was a compliment. When one has been two years absent from his native land he loves the flag that waves over the best government and the best people on the globe.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress Adjourned on Wednesday, December 22d, until January 5th. The Refunding Bill was not passed by the House, and it is probable that after the holidays there will be considerable delay before it is sent to the Senate. As some time must necessarily be taken up in preparing paper and plates for the printing of the new bonds, even after the bill has passed every stage, the delay of the measure in the House will cause the Government some embarrassment.

An unseemly altercation occurred in the House during the debate on December 21st. General Weaver, the ex-Presidential candidate of the Greenback party, and Mr. Sparks, of Illinois, became involved in a personal dispute, in which abusive epithets and oaths were freely used. It at length became so violent that the two men were only prevented engaging in a fight on the floor of the House by the intervention of their friends, who forcibly separated them. The Speaker rushed to the chair, and seizing the gavel from the hand of the chairman, shouted for order, and sent the sergeant-at-arms to enforce his commands. The two men subsequently apologized to the House for their disgraceful conduct.

Two Bills to Promote Civil Service Reform were introduced in the Senate on December 15th by Senator Pendleton, of Ohio. One of them provides that all appointments in the several departments, except the chiefs, are to be made after open and competitive examinations. A board of five commissioners, to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, is to prescribe regulations for examining and dismissing applicants and appointees. The board is to report annually to Congress, and to keep records of all their proceedings and examinations. Appointments and promotions are to be made in the order of merit assigned by the board upon the examinations, having regard also to seniority in service. All male citizens are eligible to examination and appointment, and with a few exceptions in the case of unsuitable offices, all females are to have the same opportunity.

The second bill is directed against political assessments. It is very stringent in its details, and subjects any office-holder who contributes to a fund for political purposes to instant dismissal. It also enacts that no person holding any office or employment of profit or trust shall in any manner, except by giving his own individual vote, or by public speech, intermeddle with the election of any member of either House of Congress or of the President or Vice-President, or any appointment or office, or awarding of any contract, under pain of prosecution for a high misdemeanor, and fine. The same penalties sha [illegible] who shall attempt to induce any of the persons mentioned in the act to in any way disregard it.

The Interoceanic Canal Scheme is Assuming a practical shape. The De Lesseps' Panama Company finds favor in the money markets of the world, and is being successfully floated. Some of the leading financiers of Europe have identified themselves with the project, and an American syndicate has succeeded in disposing of $6,300,000 worth of stock. Secretary Thompson has accepted the presidency of the company. Simultaneously with the revival of this scheme comes that of the Nicaragua Canal route project. A bill has been introduced in Congress to incorporate the Inter Oceanic Canal Company, and the name of General Grant appears among those of the promoters of the enterprise.

The Liquor Prohibition Bill, which is Styled the Nuisance Bill, has passed both Houses of the Vermont Legislature. The bill is exceedingly stringent in its provisions, and if executed efficiently will put a stop to liquor selling in the State. It makes any place where liquor is sold or given away, or where gambling is allowed, a nuisance, and the place is shut up, the keeper being liable to be fined from $20 to $200 and imprisonment for three months.

An Extensive Jesuit Immigration is in Progress. The members of this society expelled from France and Germany are settling in large numbers in America, especially in the West. Superintendent Warren, of California, writing to a friend, says: "Their schools are everywhere, and number probably 2000 in the State. Their new College of St. Ignatius is the largest, finest, best equipped of its kind in the United States. Three years ago the property of the Roman Catholic Church in San Francisco outvalued the sum total of the Protestant churches, parsonages, asylums, schools, and Young Men's Christian Associations by $47,000. To-day the excess is probably more than three times as much. They blow no trumpets, are sparing with statistics, but are at work night and day to break down the institutions of the country, beginning with the public schools. As surely as we live so surely will the conflict come, and it will be a hard one."

A Canadian journal says: "A number of Jesuits who were expelled from France have lately arrived in Montreal and taken up quarters temporarily with their brethren in that city. The Seminary of St. Sulpice has provided a farm of 800 acres for these exiles at Oka."

An Armed Insurrection was Expected to break out in Ireland on Sunday last. The government received information of the impending outbreak, and hurriedly dispatched a large force of picked troops to the districts where danger was apprehended. Either the government was misled, or the presence of the soldiery overawed the people, for the day passed without disturbance. There are now more than 30,000 men under arms—all regular soldiers—in Ireland, so that any open demonstration of rebellion would be promptly suppressed.

It is generally believed that projects of armed hostility originate with Irish Americans who have gone to Ireland in considerable numbers lately. The Land League is said to be opposed to any such suicidal measures, and prefers placing its dependence on the process of Boycotting, which is being rapidly extended. The process is dreaded chiefly because it is difficult to punish it under existing laws. The victim cannot sell his produce, and no one dare sell him a loaf of bread, or shoe a horse for him; but as there is no law compelling men to sell or buy if they do not wish to do so, the sufferer has no remedy in the courts, and is forced to leave the country or die of starvation. With this weapon at command the Land League practically rules Ireland, and Queen Victoria's Government is ignored by the people.

Mr. Gladstone is Deterred from Applying coercive measures to Ireland by the opposition of Mr. Chamberlain and other advanced Liberals in the cabinet, who believe that the Irish malcontents have substantial reasons for their hostile feeling toward England. It is rumored that a compromise has been effected, the terms of which will be disclosed when Parliament meets next Thursday. Journals supposed to be in the confidence of the ministers assert that a bill to redress the grievances of the people will be introduced. It will not be such a bill as the Land League demands, but sufficiently comprehensive to satisfy Mr. Chamberlain and his friends. When that is passed it is believed there will be no opposition to any coercive measures Mr. Gladstone considers necessary to enforce obedience to the laws.

Foreign Topics.—The Cable Reports Among other intelligence that a proposal has been made to Turkey and Greece to submit the questions at issue between them in relation to the frontier to the arbitration of seven statesmen, the decision of the majority to be accepted as final by both governments.—Miss Marian Evans, a novelist, whose works are extensively read on both sides the Atlantic, died suddenly December 22d. She assumed the name of George Eliot in her works and by that name she is best known. Her most popular novels are "Adam Bede," "The Mill on the Floss," "Middlemarch," and "Daniel Deronda." She was born in Warwickshire, England, in 1820.—A British court has decided that the telephone cannot be used in England without the payment of a royalty to the government, as it is an infringement of the government telegraph monopoly.—The St. Petersburg Herald says that before the Czar left Livadia the police found a newly-dug-out tunnel running from a barn near the railroad. The owner of the barn, who has a son exiled in Siberia, shot himself after the discovery.

Fifty Thousand Dollars are Already in Hand toward the establishment of Mr. Moody's new school for boys at Northfield. "My plain is," says Mr. Moody, "to take boys of unfortunate parents who are not able to educate them; but the boys shall be promising ones, and such as, if educated, would make good preachers and missionaries." The tuition bills are to be graduated according to circumstances. When it seems necessary, the boys will be taken without cost to themselves or their friends. The plan adopted is that of Mr. Spurgeon's orphanages, where the family influence is exercised. It has been found more efficacious than that of herding the boys in large numbers in one building.

Bible and Prayer Union.—The Lessons for the ensuing week are the first seven chapters of the Book of Proverbs; that for to-morrow, Dec. 31, being Prov. 1. The following requests for prayer have been received: From a young lady, that she may, if God will, be cured of an infirmity, the one dark cloud of her life.—From a wife, whose ill-health has been a source of financial trouble to her husband, that faith and patience may be given to both of them.—From a minister, that the spiritual and financial help needed for effectual work may be vouchsafed to him.—For a young man, an occasional reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that he may be led to feel his need of a Saviour.—From a wife and mother, suffering from spinal disease, that she may be strengthened in faith and patience, also that her husband and sons may be converted.

Vol. III. of the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, containing all the numbers for 1880, with a complete index, will be ready next month. Price, $3, including postage. Orders may be sent now.

A Contribution of $3.50, in Aid of Jerry McAuley's Mission, has been received from Mr. John W Wyman, Los Angeles, Cal.

A Surgeon has Lost his Life in an Attempt to save that of a patient at Greenpoint, L. I., who was suffering from diphtheria. It appears that three weeks ago Dr. Sanford, of Greenpoint, was called to the bedside of a sick child. It was a very malignant case of diphtheria, and Dr. Sanford watched the child day and night. At last the air-passages were filled up, and the child would have been choked to death had not Dr. Sanford, who had his knife in hand, immediately made an opening in the windpipe, through which, with a small rubber tube, he drew out with his own mouth the poisonous fluid. He was soon afterward himself seized with the dreadful disease, and notwithstanding the efforts of skilful medical friends, he died in acute suffering. The surgeon knew the risk to which he exposed himself in making his experiment, but there was a possibility of his escape. But Christ in the vicarious sacrifice He made knew that He must die, yet He voluntarily gave His life to ransom ours (John 10 : 18).

An Aged Debtor's Honesty was Demonstrated some time ago in Boston. The incident is related by a Boston journal, and illustrates the freeness with which God for Christ's sake forgives our great debt to Him. A Boston merchant, dying, told his sons that certain accounts he named must never be collected; they were to be placed on "the forgiven list." Shortly after his death an old man came to the office, and placing a roll of notes on the desk, said he had come to pay a bill he owed. He had owed it, he said, for twelve years, but had been unable to discharge it before, through many business disasters; but he had now brought both the principal and interest. His name was found in the forgiven list, and the merchant, gathering up the notes, replaced them in the old man's pocketbook, saying, "For the sake of my father's memory I will not take the money." The old man, who, in order to make the payment, had used all the money he had, and had sold his cow to complete the sum, went away saying, while the tears coursed down his cheeks, "What will my old woman say when I tell her this good news? She'll probably repeat the very words she used when she put her hand on my shoulder as we parted—'I have never seen the righteous forsaken, or his seed begging bread.'"

Lost on a Dangerous Reef is the Report brought by the captain of the Edith, which arrived at New York last week, concerning a vessel he had met in his voyage here from Jamaica. It appears hat the British bark Fontabella, when leaving Montego Bay, Jamaica, was becalmed, and the current carried her toward a well-known and much-dreaded reef just off Falmouth. Her danger was noticed not only by those on board, but by the captains of two other vessels, who heroically went on board to assist the crew of the imperilled vessel. All that seamanship could do to save the vessel was done, but without avail. The ship crashed on the rocks, and nearly all on board including the captains who risked their lives in the vain attempt to save the ship, were drowned. There are many such dangerous reefs in the voyage of life, on which in the calm of prosperity young people suffer shipwreck and lose their souls.

A Never-Forgotten Text.—An Incident Re-ted the other day by Mr. Moody at one of his eetings in San Francisco shows the danger of eglecting the appeals of the Holy Spirit. Mr. oody said that one day before he became a hristian he worked in the fields with a young man ho appeared under deep distress. Mr. Moody ked him the nature of his trouble, and he said at his mother, who was a Christian, took him by e hand when he was leaving home to seek his rtune and spoke these parting words: "My son, ek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all things else shall be added unto ee." When he got into the town to which he as going he went to church, and the minister ok this very text: "Seek ye first the kingdom of od." He thought it very strange. Well, he id he would not seek the kingdom then; he uld wait until he got a start in life. Yet that it troubled him. Again he went to church, and his amazement the sermon was on the very same text. He did not attend church for some time. At last he was induced again to enter the church, and, behold, he heard the preacher take that very same text. He thought then it was God speaking to him. But he coolly and deliberately made up his mind that he would not be a Christian until he had made his fortune.

Many years after, Mr. Moody, when on a visit to his old home, inquired after the young man, and was told he had lost his reason and was in a lunatic asylum. He went to see him, and the first words the lunatic addressed to him, as he did to every one he met, were, "Seek first the kingdom of God."

"My Boy."—Some Years ago the Late Horace Mann, the eminent educator, delivered an address at the opening of some reformatory institution for boys, during which he remarked that if only one boy was saved from ruin it would pay for all the cost and care and labor of establishing such an institution as that.

After the exercises had closed, in private conversation a gentleman rallied Mr. Mann upon his statement, and said to him,

"Did you not color that a little when you said all the expense and labor would be repaid if it saved only one boy?"

"Not if it was my boy," was the solemn and convincing reply. How precious are the interests bound up in a single child! How great the value of a single life, which runs on forever!

An Extraordinary Disease which Puzzles physicians has attacked a youth in Chicago. The Daily News says that the son of William Crawford, captain of a tugboat, has for seven years been sweating blood at times, and lately has had severe attacks which alarmed his parents. Great black patches appear on his body, from which blood-drops the size of a pin-head exude. Blood flows from his mouth, nose, eyes, and stomach. Sudden fright or excitement affects the flow of blood. The physicians who have taken an interest in his case propose sending him to Edinburgh and London for examination by the Academy of Surgeons. This is clearly a physical disease, but on reading of it we are reminded of the the agony of the Saviour in the garden when in his sorrow "he sweat as it were great drops of blood."

A Life was Lost for a Coat During the Recent fire at the St. Louis Smelting Company's works. The fire was caused by the bursting of a cupola of one of the furnaces, in which about twenty-five tons of lead was being smelted for refining. The engineer was standing at the door of the engine-room when the cupola burst, and as he saw the stream of molten lead flowing toward him he realized his danger, and prepared to fly. He could easily have made his escape, but thought he should have time to get his coat, which hung at the farther end of the engine-room. He stepped over the burning lead and got his coat, but on returning, the stream of liquid metal had become too wide for him to cross easily, and in endeavoring to leap over it he fell and was burned to death by inches in the lead. How many sinners have put off accepting the offer of salvation for some such trivial cause until it has become too late, and they have died in their sins (Prov. 27 : 1).

Death Resulted from the Prick of a Pin last week in Brooklyn. As Mrs. Mary Ferguson was washing some clothes she pricked the forefinger of her right hand with a brass pin. The pin penetrated the flesh about a sixteenth of an inch and produced a painful wound, but she went on with her work. The next day her finger swelled, and then her arm began to swell. It became feverish and she suffered from sharp, shooting pains in it. On Wednesday the swelling extended to her shoulder, and she was prostrated by the pain. On Wednesday night she died, and soon after death her body turned black. A physician's post-mortem examination yesterday showed that she died from blood poisoning. The spread of the poison from the small wound in the finger to the whole body illustrates the action of sin in spiritual matters. One cherished sin may harden the soul against the Spirit until often repulsed He departs, leaving the soul to eternal death (Isa. 1 : 6).

THE JOY OF JESUS.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes: even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight. All things are delivered to me of my Father: and no man knoweth who the Son is but the Father; and who the Father is but the Son, and he to whom the Son will reveal him."—LUKE 10 : 21-22.

The Record of Jesus Rejoicing — Expression Unique and Emphatic—I. Our Lord's Explanation—Jesus does not Need Prestige—Human Wisdom cannot find out God—Comparative Religion, Stolen Clothes—Human Wisdom a Hindrance—Philosophers Refuting Each Other—Practical Lessons.

LAST Lord's Day morning we considered the lamentations of Jesus; we will now turn our thoughts to the joys of Jesus. It is remarkable that this is the only instance on record in the Gospels in which our Lord is said to have rejoiced. It stands alone, and is therefore the more to be prized: "In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit." He was the "man of sorrows and acquainted with grief" for our sakes, and therefore we are not astonished to find few indications of joy in the story of His life. Yet I do not think it would be fair to infer from the fact of a solitary mention of His rejoicing that He did not rejoice at other times; on the contrary, our Lord must, despite His sorrow, have possessed a peaceful, happy spirit.

He was infinitely benevolent, and went about doing good; and benevolence always finds a quiet delight in blessing others. The joy of the lame when they leaped, and of the blind when they saw, must have gladdened the soul of Jesus. To cause happiness to others must bring home to a sympathetic bosom some degree of pleasure. Sir Philip Sydney was wont to say, "Doing good is the only certainly happy action of a man's life;" and assuredly it is hard to see how Jesus could refrain from rejoicing in blessing those around Him.

Moreover, our Lord was so pure that He had a well of joy within which could not fail Him. If it be indeed true that virtue is true happiness, then Jesus of Nazareth was happy. The poet said,

"What nothing earthly gives, or can destroy,
The soul's calm sunshine and the heartfelt joy
Is virtue's prize."

Such calm and joy must have been the Saviour's, though for our sake He bowed beneath the heavy load of sorrow.

Nor is this all, for our blessed Lord lived in unbroken fellowship with the Father, and fellowship with God will not permit a soul to abide in darkness; for, walking with God, he walks in the light as God is in the light. Such a mind may, for certain purposes, come under clouds and gloom; but light is sown for the righteous, and it will speedily break forth as the dawn of day. Those nights of prayer and days of perfect service must have brought their own calm to the tried heart of the Son of God.

Besides, Christ Jesus was a man of faith—faith's highest exposition and example. He is "the author and the finisher of faith," in whom we see its life, walk, and triumph. He it was who "for the joy that was set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame." His faith must therefore have anticipated the reward of His passion, and have brought the joy thereof home to Him even while He sorrowed here. His joy was a light from which were to be kindled by His death and victory. Be sure of this, that our Lord felt beneath the great waterfloods of outward affliction an undercurrent of joy. For He said, "These things have I spoken unto you, that my joy might remain in you, and that your joy might be full." What meant He by this if He had no joy in His people? Could He have spoken so many happy words, and so often have said to His disciples, "Be of good cheer," if He had been always downcast Himself?

But still it is remarkable that our text should be the sole recorded instance of His joy, so far as the evangelists are concerned. It is clear that joy was not a distinguishing feature in our Lord's life, so as to strike the beholder. Peace may have sat serenely on His brow, but nothing of the exuberant spirits which are seen in some men, for His countenance was marred with lines of care and grief. We do not hear that He laughed, though it is thrice recorded that He wept; and here for once, as quite unique, we find the inspired assurance that He rejoiced. Because of its singularity the record deserves to be looked into with care that we may see the cause of delight so unusual.

The words here used are very emphatic. "He rejoiced." The Greek word is much stronger than the English rendering; it signifies "to leap for joy." It is the word of the blessed virgin's song, "My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour." Strong emotions of delight were visible upon our Lord's face, and were expressed by the tones of His voice as well as by His words. It is clear that He was greatly glad.

I. First, let us look at our Lord and note that His joy was of the Gospel. "I thank thee, O Father, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." He rejoices in His Father's revelation of the Gospel. It was not joy in the fame which had gathered about His name insomuch that John heard of it in prison. It was not joy in the manifest tokens of power that went forth with His commissioners, though they rejoiced that devils were subject unto them; but it was joy in God's revealing the Gospel to the sons of men.

I call your attention to the fact that He ascribed all that was done to the Father, and joyed that the Father was working with Him. His disciples came back to Him and said, "Even the devils are subject unto us through Thy name;" and they spake not amiss, for the name of Jesus was their strength, and deserved honor; but the Lord, with that sacred self-abnegation which was so natural to Him, replies, "I thank thee, O Father, that thou hast revealed these things." He takes no honor unto Himself but ascribes [illegible] glory unto the Father, who wrought with H[illegible] Him

us any success in the preaching of the [illegible] gives our joy be that the Father's power is goin[illegible] let with the Word. We are not so much to joy i forth instrumentality as in the hand which uses th ur strument, and works by it. Oh, misery! misery to be attempting Gospel ministry without God!
But oh, bliss, bliss unspeakable, to feel that when we lift our hand God's hand is lifted too, and when we speak the Word the voice of God is ringing through our feeble speech, and reaching the hearts of men! It is to true believers a great joy that the Father is bringing home His wandering children, and receiving penitents into His bosom.

The Saviour's joy was that through the Father's grace men were being enlightened. The seventy disciples had been from city to city, working miracles and preaching the Gospel, and their Master was glad when they returned with tidings of success: "In that hour Jesus rejoiced in spirit." It pleases Jesus when the Gospel has free course, and God is glorified thereby. Then, in measure, He sees of the travail of His soul, and is filled with satisfaction.

Shall we not find our joy where He finds His? Shall we not enter into the joy of our Lord? Whenever we hear good news of a village evangelized, of a township moved by the glad tidings, of a country long shut up from the Gospel at length opened to the Word, let us feel our highest and deepest joy. Rather let us rejoice in this than in business prosperity or personal advantage. Wh if we can find no joy in our own circumstan at what if even spiritual affairs within our s[illegible] ices, full of difficulty; let us joy and rejoice tha[illegible] ul are Father is revealing the light of His G[illegible] God the pel among the sons of men. Be this our highest wish, "Thy kingdom come," and in that coming kingdom let us find our utmost happiness.

Further, our Saviour's joy lay very much in this, that this revelation to men was being made through such humble instruments. We read that "He lifted up His eyes on His disciples and said, Blessed be ye poor; for yours is the kingdom of God." There was not among the twelve, or the seventy, one person of any social status. They were the common people of the field and the sea. In after years Paul was raised up, a man richly endowed in learning, whose great abilities were used by the Lord, but the first ministers of Christ were a band of fishermen and countrymen, altogether unknown in the schools of learning, and regarded as "unlearned and ignorant men." The grandest era in the world's history was ushered in by nobodies; by persons who, like their leader, were despised and rejected of men.

Observe carefully that the persons whom our Lord had been employing were not only obscure in origin, but they were of a low degree of spiritual understanding—were in fact babes in grace as well as worldly wisdom. Their joy when they came back to tell what h[illegible] been done was evidently childish as well as gracious. They joyed in their success as children do in their little achievements; but their Lord was thankful, because He saw the open-heartedness and the simplicity of their characters in the gladsome way in which they cried, "Lord, even the devils are subject to us through thy name," and He thanked God that by such babes as these, such childern, such true-hearted children, and yet such mere children, He was pleased to make known His word among the sons of men.

Rest ye sure that our Lord even at this day finds a delight in the weakness of the instruments He uses.

"He takes the fool and makes him know
The mysteries of his grace;
To bring aspiring wisdom low,
And all its pride abase."

Not you, ye scribes, who have counted every letter of the Old Testament, does He elect to be filled with the Spirit. Not you, ye Pharisees, who so abound in outward religion, does He choose to spread the inward life and light. Not you, ye Sadducees, who are versed in sceptical philosophy, and boast your cleverness, does He call to preach His Gospel to the poor. He hath taken to be the heralds of His glory men from the sea of Galilee whom ye despise; men, simple-hearted, ready to learn, and then as ready to tell out again, the message of salvation.

Our Lord was by no means displeased with the absence of culture and learning in His followers, for the culture and learning of the period were utter vanity, but He was glad to see that they did not pretend to wisdom or astuteness, but came to Him in all simplicity to accept His teaching, because they believed Him to be the Son of God.
"And yet further His great joy was that the con- prude were of such a character as they were.
is true hast hid these things from the wise and "Have and hast revealed them unto babes." It lieved in at certain persons sneeringly asked, lightly of Je of the rulers or of the Pharisees beto be learned?" There were some who thought to His caus s because those whom they imagined that direc men had not signified their adhesion the scrib e; our Lord Himself had no concern in Other tion, but called the Pharisees blind and these [illegible] hypocrites, as they assuredly were.
conv voices may have inquired, "Who are are [illegible] hat follow Jesus? Of what class are His he rts?" The answer would have been, "They o rustics, fishermen, and common people, with w and there a woman of substance and a man means. The bulk of them are the poor to whom for the first time the Gospel is preached.
Such have gathered to Christ and received His word." Some even said that a parcel of boys and girls were in the streets crying "Hosanna," and this showed how commonplace the Preacher was. At this day I have heard the Lord's people spoken of as a poor set—people of no position, a lot of persons whose names will never be known, a mere assembly of Jack, Tom, Harry, Mary, Susan, and the rest. This was the very thing to which Jesus refers with thankfulness. He was glad that He was surrounded by unsophisticated, childlike natures, rather than by Pharisees and scribes, who even if they be converted, are sure to bring some of their old manners with them.

If those who are reckoned to be learned profess to come to Christ they are generally

A TRIAL TO THE CHURCH.

All the merely human learning that has ever come unto the church has, as a rule, been mischievous to it; and it always needs great grace to keep it in its right place. At first came the Gnostics with their philosophy, and into what perils they dragged the Church of God I cannot stay to tell you; then arose others out of whose wisdom grew Arianism, and the church was well-nigh withered to her very heart by that deadly form o heresy. The schoolmen did for her much the same, and to this day whenever any of the would be-thought-wise men meddle with religion, they tell us that the plain word of God as we read i must be interpreted by modern thought, and tha it bears another meaning which only the cultured can possibly comprehend.

When philosophy invades the domain of revelation it ends in perverting the Gospel, and in bringing in "another gospel which is not another." I is with human wisdom as it is with human riches, how hardly shall they that have it enter into the kingdom of God! True wisdom is another thing that is a gift which cometh from above, and causeth no puffing up of the heart, for it adores the God from whom it came. The wisdom which is true and real the Lord is prepared to give to those who confess their unwisdom, to those who will be babes in His sight. It is not ignorance which God loves, but conceit that He hates. Knowledge is good, but the affectation of it is evil.

Our Lord's joy sprang from one other source—namely, His view of the manner in which God was pleased to save His people. It was by revealing these things to them. There is, then, to every man who is saved a revelation, not of anything over and above what is given us in the word of God; but of that same truth to Himself personally and with power. In the word is the light; but what is needed is that each man's eye should be opened by the finger of God to see it. Truth in the Scriptures will never save till it becomes truth in the heart; it must be "revealed" unto the most unprejudiced and true-hearted.

There must be a work of the Father through the Holy Ghost upon each intellect and mind ere it can perceive the truth as it is in Jesus. Hence, when unregenerate men tell us that they cannot see the beauty of the Gospel we are not at all astonished —we never thought they could; and when boastful men of "culture" declare that the old-fashioned Gospel is unworthy of the nineteenth century with all its enlightenment, we are not surprised, for we knew that they would think so. Blind men are little pleased with color, and deaf men care little for music.

Human wisdom cannot make a man without eyes see the light. What do you know about the Gospel, oh, ye blinded wise men? What judges can you be of the light of the revelation who seal up your eyes with the mud of your own cleverness, and then say you cannot see! Christ never intended that you should. He will only reveal Himself as He pleases, and He hath pleased to do this to another kind of persons from what you are. Oh, you that are wise in your own conceit, the gate of true wisdom is barred against you! You cannot by searching find out God, and when He graciously reveals Himself you refuse to see Him, and therefore it is just that you should perish in the dark. Well do you deserve this judgment. Let justice be done.

II. I have thus tried, as far as I am able, to explain the cause of the Saviour's joy; I would now call your attention to

HIS MODE OF EXPRESSING THAT JOY.

I have noticed some kind of joy in conversions which has not been wise in its expression, but has savored of glorying in the flesh. "Oh, we have had a wonderful time, we have had a blessed season! We have been visited by those dear men, and we have exerted ourselves in downright earnest to get up a revival. We have done wonders." Such talk will not do. Hear how the Saviour speaks; His joy finds tongue in thanksgiving—"I thank thee, O Father." He ascribes the work to the Father, and then renders all the praise to Him. This is the eloquence of joy—"I thank thee, O Father."

Brethren, whenever you are happy sing hymns of thanksgiving. "Is any merry? let him sing psalms." The fittest language for joy, whether it be on earth or in heaven, is adoration and thanksgiving to God. Blessed be the name of the Lord that we are gladdened in the harvest-field of Christian work; for it is He that giveth seed to the sower and causeth the Word to spring up and bring forth fruit a hundredfold.

Our Lord found expression for His joy in declaring the Father's sovereignty. "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth." Some shrink back from the idea of God as Lord of all things above and below. To them the free-will of man seems the greatest of all facts; and lest there should be the slightest intrusion upon man's domain they would have God limited as to His absolute power. To magnify man they would minimize God. You will hear them talking against those of us who magnify divine sovereignty, and imputing to us the notion of a certain arbitrariness in God, although such a thought has never entered our minds. Jehovah, who gives no account of His matters, but orders all things according to the good pleasure of His will, is never arbitrary, unjust, or tyrannical; and yet He is absolute and uncontrolled, a sovereign who reigns by His own self-existent power, Himself

THE SOURCE OF ALL LAW.

I will go the utmost length as to the absolute supremacy of God, and His right to do as He wills, and especially to do as He wills with His own, which Gospel grace most certainly is. He will have mercy on whom He will have mercy, and He will have compassion on whom He will have compassion, and none can stay His hand, or say unto Him, What doest thou? When Christ was gladdest He expressed that gladness by ascribing unto God an infinite sovereignty, and shall that truth be gloomy to us? Nay, rather we will each one view the work of the Father's grace, and cry, "I thank thee, O Father, and I thank thee all the more because I know that thou art Lord of heaven and earth."

Dismiss from your minds all caricatures of the doctrine, and receive it in its purest form—"The Lord is king for ever and ever. Hallelujah." Your joy, if it be deeply spiritual and very great, will never find room enough for the sweep of its Atlantic waves till you delight yourself in the absolute supremacy of God. The deep ground swell of delight within the Redeemer's soul could find no grander space over which it could expand its force than the unlimited power and dominion of the Lord of heaven and earth, whose key it is which opens or shuts the kingdom of heaven, whose word it is which hides or reveals the things of eternity.

Our Lord delighted in the special act of sovereignty which was before Him, that the Lord had "hid these things from the wise and prudent, and had revealed them unto babes." He communed with God in it, He took pleasure in it, and said, "Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight." His voice, as it were, went with the Father's voice; He agreed with the Father's choice, He rejoiced in it, He triumphed in it. The will of the Father was the will of Christ, and He had fellowship with the Father in every act of His sovereign choice; yea, He magnified God for it in His inmost spirit. He says, "Even so, Father; for so it seemed good in thy sight;" for He knew that what seems good to God must be good.

Some things seem good to us which are evil; but that which seemeth good to God is good. Jesus praises God about it for no other reason than it is God's pleasure that it should be so. Oh, what a state of heart it will be for you and me to get into when we can express our highest joy by a perfect acquiescence in the will of God, whatever that will may be. See here, brethren, the road to contentment, to peace, to happiness, yea, heavenly life this side the grave. If you ever come to feel that what pleases God pleases you, you will be glad even in affliction and tribulation. If your heart is ever schooled down to accept as your will that which is God's will, and to believe anything to be good because God thinks it good, then you may go through the rest of your days singing and waiting till your Lord takes you to His own bosom.

III. Thirdly, and briefly, I want you to see

of the Father's act. The Father had been pleased to hide these things from the wise and prudent and to reveal them unto babes, and Jesus Christ is perfectly satisfied with that order of things, quite content with the kind of converts He has and the kind of preachers that God has given Him.

For, first, the Lord Jesus does not need prestige. Read the twenty-second verse—"All things are delivered to me of my Father." A mere pretender, when he begins to prophesy and set himself up for a religious leader, how pleased he is when some learned doctor indorses his claims! If some man of wealth and station comes to his side how he plumes himself! The Saviour of our souls sought no such aids. The verdict of the world's literati could not make his word more truthful than it is, nor more convincing, for its power lies in the Spirit which reveals it. If great men say "Aye," they will not make His doctrine more sure; nor will they make it less truthful if they all say "Nay." Prestige for Christ! It is blasphemy to think of such a thing. "All things," saith he, "are delivered to me of my Father."

Jesus needs no imprimatur from scholars, no patronage from princes, no apologies from orators. The pomp and power and wisdom and cunning of the world were not with Him, and He thanks God that He is not incumbered with such doubtful gain, but that this truth has been revealed to those who are not wise in their own eyes, nor intelligent in their own esteem, but, like children, willing to learn from God, and glad to believe all that He reveals.

See how the Lord explains it yet further by showing that human wisdom cannot find out God. "No man knoweth who the Son is but the Father, and who the Father is but the Son." No man, though he be a master in Israel. Men of science may puzzle their brains, and with great ingenuity they may try to thread the intricacies of the unknown, but they must err from the truth if they refuse revelation. Such a thing as natural religion, spontaneously born of man's intellect, does not exist. "Oh," say you, "surely there is much of it." I say that whatever is truly religious in it was borrowed from revelation, and has been handed down by tradition.

Talk of comparative religions—there is but one, and the other pretenders have stolen certain of its clothes. Men see, no doubt, much of God in nature, but they would not have done so had there been no revelation. First came the light through revelation, and then afterward, when men saw it reflected from various objects, they dreamed that the light came out of the reflectors. Men hear something of revealed truth, and when their thoughts run in that line, that which they have heard is awakened in their minds, and they think themselves inventors. God is not known except as He reveals Himself, nor can He be discovered by human ingenuity. Carnal wit and thought tend not that way, but tend from God unto blackest darkness.

The power, then, which lies in merely human wisdom is a force which often hinders men from coming under the influence of revelation. Only by revelation can they know, and by a revelation personally receive. But the man is so wise that he does not want to be taught; he can find it out for himself. Yield himself to an infallible book or an infallible spirit? Not he! Well, then, because of his very wisdom he becomes incapable of learning.

Truth to tell,

WHAT IS HUMAN WISDOM?

The supposed wisdom of man is folly; that is the short for it all. They write a history sometimes of religious thought, and of the various phases through which Christianity has gone, and on this they ground remarks; but I should like somebody write a truthful history of philosophy. The history of philosophy is a record of the insanities mankind, a catalogue of lunacies.

You shall see one generation of philosophers busily engaged in refuting those that went before them, and doing it very well indeed. But what will the next generation do? Why refute this! The philosophies that were current one hundred years ago are all exploded now, and all the teachings of to-day, except such as are clear matters of fact, will be exploded ere I go down to my grave, if I live to be gray-headed. There is not a philosopher now living that can be sure but what there is some other fact to be discovered yet which will upset every hypothesis that he hath sent forth into the world. Philosophers who conceitedly glory over believers in revelation are fools, for they know nothing with certainty, and absolute certainty appertains only to divine revelation.

Brethren, simple teachableness is for the reception of a revelation from God, and if you have it to-day, if you are seeking after truth, if you are crying after her, and if you are willing that God should reveal her to you, if you are anixous that He should reveal truth to you in Christ, you are the sort of person upon whom God in sovereignty looks with divine favor, and unto such as you are will He reveal Himself. What is wanted is faith—a childlike, receptive faith; not faith in a pope, not faith in a man, not faith in an old established creed, but faith in God.

Now a lesson or two, and I have done. The first lesson to be learned is this. If great men, if eminent men, if so-called learned men, are not converted, do not be cast down about it—it is not likely they will be. In the next place, if many converts are obscure persons—persons without note or name—do not be at all disgusted with that fact. Who are you that you should be? Who are you that you should despise any upon whom God has looked in favor? Rather rejoice exceedingly with your Lord that God hath chosen the despised, and you with them.

Next, learn that the sovereignty of God is always exercised in such a way that the pure in heart may always rejoice in it. God never did a sovereign act yet that the loving Christ Himself could not rejoice in. Be you content, therefore, to leave everything in the hand of God that you do not understand, and when His way is in the sea, be quite as glad as when his way is in the sanctuary; when His footsteps are not known, feel that they are quite as righteous and quite as holy as when you can perceive the path in which He moves.

THE ULTIMATE HONOR OF THE GOSPEL

is secured unto God alone. When the wind-up of all things shall come there shall be no honor to any of us, nor would we desire it; but out of it all, out of the choice of each one, and out of the revelation made to each one, will come up, multiplied into a thousand thunders, the voice as of Christ in His whole mystical body, "I thank thee, O Father." This shall be the song of heaven concerning the whole matter, as well concerning the lost as the saved. "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth." There shall be no cavils among the pure in heart, nor questions among the perfected spirits, but the whole family reviewing the whole of the Father's government, the hiding as well as the revealing, shall at the last say, Christ leading the utterance, "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes."

Brothers and sisters, let us learn our need of a personal revelation, let us seek it if we have not yet received it; with a childlike spirit, let us seek it in Christ, for He only can reveal the Father to us; and when we have it let it be our joy that we see Him revealing it to others, and let this be our prayer, that the God of Jacob would yet bring others unto Christ, who shall rejoice in the light that has made glad our eyes. The Lord be with you. Amen.

RETROSPECT OF 1880.

National Prosperity—The Year's Events—Political—Social—Religious—Foreign Topics — Obituary.

THE feelings of the Christian who, at the close of this year, recalls to memory its leading events, must be in unison with those of the Psalmist when he said: "One generation shall praise thy works unto another, and declare thy mighty acts. They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and shall sing of thy righteousness." To the American citizen especially does the year now nearly closed appeal for such an expression of praise. The goodness of God has been manifested throughout our land, and the blessing of God has been abundantly poured out upon us. National prosperity, unprecedented in extent, must be gratefully acknowledged, and to the Giver of all good we give all the glory.

POLITICAL.

The year opened amid the excitement and uncertainty which usually characterize the year of the Presidential election. Indications were not wanting that the coming struggle would be one of unprecedented severity, and though every patriot felt that the Constitution was at present safe, yet fears were entertained that we might witness an innovation which might be the precursor of a change in our form of Government at some distant day. The condition of affairs in the State of Maine, where the result of the elections as announced by the Governor was disputed, occasioned some apprehension. But the difficulty was ultimately adjusted without the conflict which at one time seemed inevitable. The action of the Sand-lots party in San Francisco also excited considerable anxiety, but the party of order succeeded in checking an uprising which, it was feared, might ultimately assume a character allied to socialism and communism.

As the Presidential question took shape in the State Conventions, it became manifest that the Republican party was divided on the subject of its candidate. At the time the National Convention assembled at Chicago it was impossible to predict its issue. The names of Grant, Blaine, Sherman, and others were prominent, but of the candidate finally chosen nothing had been said leading to the expectation of his success. Later, as the candidates of both parties were before the constituency, a feeling of relief prevailed, for both had selected a standard-bearer worthy of the high position to be filled. There was much in the conduct of the election to regret, notably the resurrection of the sectional issue on the one side, and the personal attacks on the other, but when the result was announced, it was acquiesced in on all sides, and we were spared a repetition of the period of uncertainty and apprehension which agitated the country four years ago.

As is usually the case in the Presidential election years, the legislative work of Congress has been of the smallest. The payment of the Federal electoral officers was again the subject of dispute, and some inconvenience was caused by delay in making other appropriations.

The most prominent political result of the year in its bearings on the future has been in relation to the position of men who had acquired a leading position in their respective States, and were popularly supposed to control the parties to which they belonged. In New York, in Pennsylvania, in Maine, and elsewhere, it has been demonstrated that the people rule, and that arrogance and arbitrary rule will never be tolerated under our flag.

SOCIAL TOPICS.

The temperance cause has made rapid progress during the past year. In every State an active campaign has been carried on, and it is evident that while much remains to be done, the principle of total abstinence has gained a hold on a large section of society, and is increasing and extending through the community. The adoption of a prohibition amendment in Kansas is a distinct triumph, and the important position prohibition occupied in the Maine election, indicates that in that State, too, the friends of temperance are still numerous and active.

The immense flood of immigration which, throughout the year, has flowed into our ports is an auspicious circumstance which must not be overlooked. The number of the immigrants from all lands, their character, and their pecuniary resources, are all gratifying evidences of the present as well as of the future prospects of the United States. The English colony of Rugby in Tennessee is one of the most remarkable features of this influx of population. It is an experiment which has in it many of the elements of success, and which will probably, after a time, lose its peculiarly distinctive features and become absorbed into the general-mass of the American people.

The tendency to speculation which generally accompanies a period of prosperity has not been lacking during the past year. Corners in wheat, in coffee, and other articles of daily consumption have been made, but in nearly every instance have failed, and in some cases have brought disaster on those who sought to thrive on the necessities of the people in general. Individually, too, speculation has worked harm to prominent members of the business community. There have been many painful disclosures, from which it has become apparent that in the haste to grow rich men are liable to misappropriate the funds committed to their care by others, and to wreck character and postion in their unholy greed.

The return of Lieutenant Schwatka from his Arctic exploration will render the year memorable in the annals of geographical science. In clearing up the sad mystery which hung over the fate of Sir John Franklin and his companions he did a work which elicited praise from both sides the Atlantic, and he and his gallant party have registered their names on the pages of the world's roll of honor.

RELIGIOUS.

The religious condition of the country calls for increased activity and earnest prayer to God, for an outpouring of His Spirit. The rate of progress in commercial prosperity finds no parallel in the churches. While infidelity, scepticism, and spiritualism grow and thrive, the various denominations of Christians report but little if any increase. The dangers which accompany prosperity are obviously in operation, and it may be that God will visit us with some serious financial disasters, if that discipline is necessary to revive the spiritual life of the people.

The revival which followed the work of Mr. Moody at Baltimore, and attended him at St. Louis, and is now going on at San Francisco, are evidences that God is willing—is waiting to bless efforts put forth in His name and for His glory. Mr. Harrison's work at Philadelphia and at Dr. Talmage's Tabernacle are other bright spots in an otherwise gloomy retrospect, and they should be an encouragement moving us to prayer and labor.

CASUALTIES.

Every year brings with it calamities which distress the public, and render its memory in many households one of desolation and bereavement. This year has been no exception. The calamity at Madison Square Garden, New York, on April 21st; the burning of the Narragansett, on June 11th, quickly followed by that of the Seawanhaka, on June 28th; and later, the loss of the Alpena on Lake Michigan, and the Rhode Island in the Sound; the fatal disaster in the tunnel between New York and Jersey City; the terrible railroad catastrophe at May's Landing, on August 12th—are only a few of the many calamities which have made the year a sad one to families who were thereby deprived of their loved ones.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Turning now from domestic topics to the affairs of the old world, we are struck by the uneasiness and insecurity which is a characteristic of almost every land. The nations are troubled. Nation has risen against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; there have been "famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places." The condition of the world is such as our Lord said would indicate the nearness of His second coming, and it is remarkable that the tendency of the policy which European statesmen are pursuing, is toward the rapid development of that partition of Europe which students of prophecy have been led to expect.

In Great Britain the year has been fruitful of momentous events. Lord Beaconsfield, who at the opening of the year held the reins of power, was unseated by the vote of the people, and Mr. Gladstone, who had ostensibly abdicated his position as leader of the opposition six years before, was placed at the head of affairs. The Liberial administration has been confronted with a problem which has taxed its resources to the utmost, and which has during the last few weeks increased in the gravity of its character. Ireland was stricken with famine, and though through the generous benevolence of sympathizing friends, among whom Americans occupied a distinguished place, some of its worst features were alleviated, that unhappy country underwent a period of bitter suffering.

The horrors of famine were succeeded by political agitation. Unhappily for Ireland, crafty men possessed the ear of the people, and held up before them, as the best means of improving their position, a movement of hostility toward England. A social war on landlords was inaugurated, and the refusal to pay rent became common among tenants. An organization under the title of the Land League assumed control of the movement, and under its management intimidation, persecution, and assassination have been utilized as means to effect its purposes. Not for many years has a state of affairs so ominous prevailed in Ireland, and those persons who have observed the situation most closely, are filled with apprehension as to the future.

The Afghan difficulty, in which Great Britain was engaged when the year opened, and which even then caused much uneasiness, issued in new disasters to the British arms. General Roberts, however, finally overcame all opposition, and a new Ameer of Afghanistan was appointed, with whom the British hope to maintain friendly relations.

European attention was during many months concentrated on the affairs of Turkey. The process of depletion ordained by the Congress of Berlin was resisted by the Sultan, and it became a question whether he would not succeed in defying the united will of the European Powers. Combined action, however, aroused fears which prompted concession; and although the arrangement drawn up by the Powers has not been realized, yet the Sultan has learned that it is unsafe to trifle with public opinion, and may eventually discover that his wisest policy is to carry out the remaining articles of the programme.

In Russia the plots of the Nihilists during the early months of the year caused general uneasiness. They were planned with so much ability, and executed with so much boldness, that it was feared a general overturn of the government would be effected. On February 17th a portion of the Czar's winter palace was blown up, and although he escaped injury, his escape was so narrow as to create serious alarm among his family and friends. It was the fifth deliberate attempt to assassinate him, and was obviously the work of desperate and reckless men. Since then, by surrendering to his minister Louis Melikhoff, the virtual control of the government, he has succeeded in escaping from the direct attacks of the conspirators.

Among other conspicuous foreign events of the year have been the famine in Persia, the earthquakes at Agram in Austria, and at Manila in the Phillippine Islands, the expulsion of the Jesuits from France, and the anti-Jewish movement in Germany.

We have chronicled these events as they occurred in the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, but in this rapid summary can only mention them briefly as among the topics which will make the year memorable in the history of the world.

OBITUARY.

Death has been busy among all ranks and conditions of men. The Church on earth has lost during the year Drs. Keith, Hallock, Gilbert Haven, William Adams, Bush, Rufus Anderson, Plumer, Vail, and Nathan Bishop. Among other eminent persons who have passed from the scene of their labors are General Myer, Mr. James Lenox, Dr. Ripley, George Eliot, the Indian Chief Ouray, Judge Sanford Church, the Empress of Russia, and Lord Stratford de Redcliffe.
